Mr. HOPWOOD. Perhaps I ought not to have told that. I may get into trouble yet, although I think the limitation will probably save me now.

I want to say that I think we are all for good roads. It is only a question of how to get them. We used to build them in the township and have the supervisors attend to it. Then afterwards the county took a chance at it, and aid was given to the supervisors. Later on the State took it up, and the State of Pennsylvania is contributing now to the extent of three or four million dollars a year to help her counties build roads. Now, the National Government is asked to go back 75 or 100 years and take up what it started to do at that time and again aid in the building of roads. I think there is plenty of room in this great road-building propaganda in the United States to allow the Federal Government to take a part. I am sorry we can not take a greater part, and in view of the fact that our finances are not in the best of condition, probably $25,000,000 is all we can afford to appropriate at this time. However, I am favorable to that amount to start with. It is not a very large sum. If we find the money with which to run this Government at all, out of that money we can take this $25,000,000. So I am favorable to the bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Can not the gentleman withhold that until we get through with this other amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. KENT] is recognized.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, our President has stated that there is a vast amount of difference between State rights and State functions. The bill we are considering is a question in point. This matter of road building is peculiarly local in its nature. It concerns first the landowner, concerns next the small community, and next the county, next the State, and, last of all, the Federal Government. I believe that when the Federal Government goes into the business of road building it will open up a larger pork barrel than even the rivers and harbors bills could open. There will never be any limit or end to such legislation or such appropriation.

I happen to have the misfortune of owning a great many more or less useless acres of land in this country, and I would not have the gall or the nerve to go to the Federal Government to ask for one cent for road building in any locality where I am personally interested, and I do not believe that other landowners, small or large, should ask for Federal subsidy. We can not have the roads superintended from Washington. It is utterly impossible. They must be cared for and sustained by local communities, and any adequate system of inspection and preservation from Washington is an absurdity. Without a Federal inspection and repair Federal money would be dumped in a sewer. The roads must be maintained, if they are going to be good for anything, day by day, week by week, year by year, and that can never be done from the Central Government. It must be done by local communities, acting in their own interests and spending in conformity with those interests. Therefore I stand here opposed to Federal appropriations for what is fundamentally the duty and the obligation of local communities, and which is for the benefit of individuals under the fallacy of fee simple land tenure, which can only be controlled under taxation by local communities.

Some of us talk about money for such appropriations as though it came out of the air, as though it did not cost anybody anything. All taxes have one source, the pockets of our people.

The question of national defense is another question, but, as it has been dragged in, I must state that it is one in which I am interested along with every other American citizen. Money for this purpose is an insurance fund. How large that insurance fund should be I do not know and nobody here can tell. It is an insurance fund for the preservation of our national existence, for a demonstration of democracy amongst a self-contained, self-restrained people. No one has fought more bitterly against preparation for war than I have. No one has been a more ardent advocate of peace than I have been. And yet it seems to me that when you are out in a lot where there is a dangerous bull, or going down a street where you are liable to meet a mad dog, you feel better if you have a pitchfork for the bull or a club for the dog. [Laughter and applause.]

That is our situation to-day. I used to believe that the world was becoming civilized, but I have lost some of my confidence in that assumption. I hope that we shall go ahead and play this game as a good man would play a game of poker. [Laughter and applause.] We must be able to call the bluff of people who seem to the rational to be rabid and insane, and then when the insanity has passed away we can pull in our horns and stop all talk of war insurance. But we must have the cards to justify a call; and, as we are dealing for ourselves, if we do not have them, that is our fault.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. KENT. Yes; with pleasure and gratitude.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I just wanted to inquire what peculiar game it was that the gentleman mentioned.

Mr. KENT. Pinochle. [Laughter.]

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. KENT. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. In playing that game, which one is to be the loser? There must always be a loser, as I understand.

Mr. KENT. I know, but the bluffer sometimes wins in playing—in pinochle, I mean. [Laughter.] Anyhow, we must be able to make the bluff good.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Delaware rise?

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. To discuss the amendment.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, there is an amendment pending before the House.

Mr. MANN. I make a point of order that the debate on the amendment has closed.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make the point of order that there is one amendment pending, and an amendment to that amendment, and we must dispose of that before discussion is in order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment reported. Is the gentleman from Missouri going to vote for it?

Mr. SHACKLEORD. I have no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the figures "2,000" and inserting "two thousand five hundred."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, of course those are figures written in the amendment. I would say strike out "2,000" in figures and insert "twenty-five hundred" in words.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment. I send it to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WHEELER] offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WHEELER offers the following amendment to the amendment: After the word "year" insert the following: "and for the fiscal year 1917 and annually thereafter there is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $25,000,000, to carry out the provisions of this act."

Mr. WHEELER. Now, Mr. Chairman, so far as this very important——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri makes a point of order. What is the point of order?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WHEELER] is recognized.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I offer this very important amendment owing to the fact that it is possible, if this bill should be enacted into law, that the Committee on Appropriations in the Senate or in the House might refuse to appropriate.

True, under the present administration this amendment means nothing, for we are all well aware of the fact that at the end of this fiscal year there will be no money on hand, and the same would be true if the present administration were in power for the next 25 years to come. [Laughter.] My Democratic friends over here admit privately, and, of course, confidentially, that on March 4 next there will be a change of administration, and under an economical administration we shall undoubtedly have a balance every year.

Therefore, gentlemen of the House, I considered it important that this amendment be adopted, because, as I have just stated, in the event one of the Committees on Appropriations refuses to appropriate the money, under the next administration of the country we shall have funds on hand at the end of the year to go on and help build good roads. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this committee has no authority to make an appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the word "more," in next to the last line of the amendment, and inserting "less."

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I attempted to explain the object of my amendment a while ago. It is this: As the amendment is now written, it puts a limitation upon the appropriation, whereas by striking out "more than $25,000,000," and inserting in lieu thereof "less," we leave unshackled the succeeding Congresses to do as they please. In other words, Mr. Chairman, it unleashes those patriotic gentlemen who would like to see, at some future time, a greater amount of money appropriated for this beneficent piece of legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it may be entirely unnecessary, yet there are so many Members of the House who are not yet fully familiar with the practice of the House that I am going to say a word about this portion of the bill. The practice in the House is that committees which do not have the right to bring in appropriations, as a rule, instead of appropriating money for a specific purpose, bring in a bill for the authorization of an appropriation, so that appropriations may be segregated in certain bills, so that Members may find upon an examination of appropriation bills whether an appropriation bill has been made for a specific purpose, and not be required to search through the entire volume of the statutes to see whether an appropriation is carried in some local or special bill.

Under the provisions of this bill, if enacted into law, and under the rules of the House, an appropriation of $25,000,000 can be reported from the Committee on Appropriations in the sundry civil bill, if that shall be the bill that carries this item, as would naturally be the case; and if the committee does not bring in the item in the sundry civil bill and it is not carried in any other bill, any Member in the House is entitled to offer an amendment on the floor, when the bill is under consideration, to make the appropriation of $25,000,000. That amendment would not be in order unless we had previously authorized it by law, because the rules forbid an amendment for an object which is not authorized by law, with certain exceptions, and this would not be one of the exceptions. So that, after all, the orderly way of making the appropriation for this or any other purpose is first to authorize it by law, and then it goes without saying that, as a rule, where Congress has spoken by special law and made an authorization, the Committee on Appropriations brings in the appropriation in accordance with the authorization of law. Only the other day we appropriated $2,000,000 for the Alaska railroad. When the bill for the Alaska railroad was brought in it carried an appropriation. The House struck that out and made the authorization, leaving it to the Committee on Appropriations, nearly every member of which was opposed to the Alaska railroad, to bring in the appropriation when necessary; and they brought in an item of $2,000,000 on the urgent deficiency bill the other day because they knew very well that, as far as their duty was concerned, it was to obey the will of Congress as spoken by the Alaska railroad bill.

Now, I do not think that we ought to make the appropriation unlimited. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] has offered an amendment which takes off the lid entirely. If his amendment should prevail, Congress, in a spasm of hysterics, might appropriate $250,000,000 or $2,500,000,000, and it would be in order in the House, or an amendment to that would be in order in the House. After all, while we are wise and, in the main, cool and conservative, the House and every legislative house, guards itself and its own Members by rules against acting too hastily, on the spur of the moment, without consideration.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. If the authorization was limited to $25,000,000 a year, and in the next sundry civil appropriation bill an appropriation bill was brought in for $27,500,000, would it not be subject to the point of order?

Mr. MANN. It would be subject to the point of order, but any Member or the chairman of the committee could then offer an amendment for $25,000,000 a year as provided by law.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I understand my colleague [Mr. MANN]. Do I understand my colleague to say that we may not anywhere legislate and provide a permanent appropriation, and that an amendment so providing would not be in order?

Mr. MANN. I will say to my colleague that I did not speak on the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. I quite agree with my friend from the standpoint of orderly legislation.

Mr. MANN. I was not discussing the amendment which was ruled out on a point of order.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I move to strike out the last word. In the last Congress I voted against this bill and I will vote against it now. I think the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] enlightened the House very well upon the purpose behind the bill and the future of these appropriations. I look upon this as the entrance of the camel's nose under the tent and the proposed legislation as the glorification of pork.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield just a minute?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. With pleasure.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman is not condemning me for my frankness, is he?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. No; it would be hard to condemn the gentleman from Georgia; I know him too well. But I wish to say that the purpose of this legislation is apparent in the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, who puts up, unconsciously perhaps, the warning signal. We are appropriating to-day $25,000,000, but he said that in the succeeding Congress, somebody, recognizing the beneficent work that this Congress has done, will be asking for $50,000,000. Later on another gentleman, recognizing the beneficent work of that succeeding Congress, will be asking for $75,000,000, and so it will go on until it amounts to $300,000,000 or $400,000,000.

I am very glad that the statement has been made, in order that Members of this House may know what they are doing when they vote upon this bill. I believe that the purpose of it is wrong. Good roads are local matters, and Federal care is improper and unwise. I believe this Government of ours has problems enough upon its hands. For one, I wish at least to defer this appropriation for roads, because a greater problem confronts this Nation, something for the consideration of the people, not only along the seaboard but throughout the length and breadth of the Nation. I believe in deferring to the admonitions of those who are charged in an executive way with the concerns of this Nation. I take stock in their warnings and give heed to them, and I believe it is the duty of this Congress in a paramount way to give consideration to the question of national defense. [Applause.] I do not believe in appropriating this money when we have not got it. I believe, first and foremost, in making provisions for that thing which concerns us as a Nation in maintaining our national life. This Nation was worth fighting to establish. It is worth fighting, if necessary, to maintain. [Applause.] I am one of those who do not take a great deal of stock in the magic of men jumping up in a minute by the million to defend their country without any previous preparation, and so I hope this Congress will at least defer this legislation until we have given consideration to those weightier and far more important questions that confront us to-day. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 1, strike out the word "agriculture" and the succeeding words to and including "marketing farm products," and insert "the manufacture and sale of automobiles."

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment simply to put the bill on an honest basis. I represent two of the greatest agricultural counties in the State of New York.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order comes after debate, and it is too late.

Mr. PLATT. I want to say that I have never had a letter from a farmer in favor of this bill, but I have had a letter from an automobile manufacturer in my district and several from automobile clubs. There are 60 organized granges in my district, and they are frequently passing resolutions and sending them to me, but have sent none in favor of this bill. They know what the bill is; they know that it is a bill written by the automobile manufacturers. It will not do the farmers any good. This talk about its being for the benefit of the farmers is all bunk, and most of the oratory about the down-trodden farmer is hypocritical bunk. In speaking about the bill passed last year I said that there have been more foolish things advocated for the benefit of the farmer than crimes committed in the name of liberty. I suppose that nothing can stop the passage of this bill. It is one of those bills that everybody in private conversation says ought not to be passed, but there are only a few of us who dare to vote against it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the gentleman believe that the bill we passed last year is better than this bill?

Mr. PLATT. I think from the standpoint of the farmer it was, but I was against that, too.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Did the gentleman vote for the bill in the last Congress?

Mr. PLATT. I did not.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I should not take the time of the House at this moment to reply to the jocular remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], for I realize they were made in part facetiously, as he admits, were it not that in his attack on Boston his long-range verbal artillery somewhat peppered me as well as my State, saying that I opposed the bill from the national-defense standpoint because of the powder company in my State. I commend to him the geography he used to study in school when he makes the statement that because there are certain factories making powder within the boundaries of my State I dared to get up here to-day and give my reasons why I should vote against his bill. I realize that he was in part facetious, but if his remarks should be taken seriously by any person or by any who read them, I want to say a little on the other side. The gentleman from Missouri has said so much about a certain "war-bride" stock, the factories of which are not contained in any one section, for they are scattered all over this Union, that I have probably as much right to accuse him of having bucked the market and lost as he has to impute unfair motives to me. [Laughter and applause.] I should probably have just as much right to say that the other day when there was a debate on the embargo question, and the great Missouri mule was brought up, that he was perfectly willing to have an embargo on everything except the animal that hauled the engines of war. [Laughter.]

I do not impute any sinister motives to him, but I think I would have as much right to impugn his motives on the question of embargo as he has to stand up here and attack a stock on Wall Street and then lay me over to the charge that I voted against his bill for the reason that I wanted to favor that business.

I gave my reasons for voting against the bill in a speech earlier to-day. I said your President came here upon the opening day of Congress, and if there were two salient points in his message that impressed one, regardless of how they felt on the preparedness question and revenue, it was the fact that the question of national defense and the question of revenue was to the fore. And yet we see this committee bringing in here to-day a bill which will take $25,000,000 out of the Public Treasury before even the questions brought forth in the message of the President are considered. As I said this morning, you, or a majority on your sade, are struggling to-day to meet the revenue situation. I do not mean to stand up here and point out as a new Member—for I am a new Member and I accept the gentleman's accusation—and try to tell the leaders on both sides what to do, but I can not vote for this bill, benefiting my State as it does in the way of some money being given it by the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Delaware has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware asks that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. I object. I will withdraw the objection, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, if any gentleman objects, I make the point of order that he must stand in his place.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. BLACK. I had already withdrawn the objection.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. As I said this morning, Mr. Chairman, my State has as much area in agriculture as any of the congressional districts in the Eastern States. I realize that under this bill it will get $103,000, but the people of the State will have to raise $103,000 more. I realize it is far easier for me to vote yea on this bill than it is to vote nay, but I believe that when you have conscientiously considered the bill and the debates upon it and have reached the conclusion that you should vote against it, that that should be enough, and that Members should not come in here and try to impugn your motives, whether they do so in a joking vein or seriously. I reiterate that this bill will be of some benefit to my State, but I am willing to go to the people there next fall with my reasons for voting against it. I do not think we should enter into an expenditure of this amount, and it will call for a larger amount in future Congresses. In other words, although this will benefit my State, I believe in considering the measure from the viewpoint of a national legislator rather than from the fact that it will help any district. [Applause.]

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, of the amendment, after the word "year" insert "Provided, however, That no such aid shall be given except as a part of a comprehensive plan for a complete system of highways connecting the several States, which plan shall be prepared and published by a board composed of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Postmaster General within six months after the passage of this act."

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is not subject to a point of order. This is a limitation purely upon the language of the bill.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It seeks to create a board.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Missouri to make the point of order?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I make the point of order, although I can reserve it. The point of order I was about to make was that the amendment proposes to create a board, which is not germane to that section of the bill, but I shall withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri withdraws the point of order.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that has been offered by the committee, and of which we all have printed copies, seeks to uphold the constitutionality of this bill by referring to three great departments of the National Government, and by specifying that the roads proposed to be constructed under its provisions may be used for the transportation of interstate commerce, so that it will come under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution; the transportation of military supplies, so that it will come under the constitutional power to raise and support armies; or for the transportation of postal matter, so that it will come under the power of Congress to establish post offices and post roads.

Mr. Chairman, this bill with this amendment proposed by the committee purports to be a national bill. One of the reasons why I have always been a Republican is because the Republican Party has stood ever since its birth in favor of having the National Government do things that are national in scope and character. This bill, however, as it comes to us from the committee, even with this misleading amendment, has nothing national in it. There is no more justification or excuse for this bill than there would be for a bill appropriating money out of the National Treasury to construct schoolhouses in the different States of the Union, or for a bill to construct police stations in the different States of the Union, or for a bill to construct sewers in the different cities and towns of the United States. If, however, the amendment which I have offered—and offered in good faith—is adopted, the bill will be national in character.

I have taken the committee at its word, and in my amendment I have provided that before any aid can be given out of the National Treasury under this act there must be a comprehensive plan, established, prepared, and published by a board representing these three great departments of the Government which are named in the committee amendment, namely, the Secretary of War as representing the moving of military supplies and forces, the Secretary of Commerce as representing the transportation of interstate commerce, and the Postmaster General as representing the interest of the National Government in post offices and post roads. With such an amendment providing for the preliminary preparation and publication of such a comprehensive plan of which every mile of road built under the provisions of this bill must be an integral part, we men who believe in a National Government for national purposes can support a bill of this kind, but in its present form, never.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman support this bill if we adopt his amendment?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts to the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DALLINGER) there were—ayes 63, noes 112.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the amendment be amended by striking out the figures "25," in line 11, and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "40."

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I am offering this amendment in good faith. The amount of the appropriation, after all, will rest with the Committee on Appropriations each year. That committee can report no appropriation at all, or if it wishes, it can report any amount up to the amount fixed as a limit by this bill. My idea is that we ought to fix a limit higher than $25,000,000. I anticipate that there will come a time when the Treasury of this country will be in better shape than it is now, when the annual revenues of the Government will be sufficient to meet its necessary expenditures and leave a fair surplus in the Treasury, and the Appropriation Committee ought to have a wider latitude than this bill gives. I do not believe that the amount should be unlimited, as was proposed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD], but I do think we ought to raise the limit that can be appropriated to at least $40,000,000 in any one year. Now, while I have the floor, Mr. Chairman, I want to briefly express my views upon this bill. I think the committee amendment, as amended, should be accepted. I think it improves the bill from a legal point of view. I have had some misgivings as to the constitutionality of this measure. This amendment of the committee broadens the scope of the bill and goes a long way toward removing what I consider a constitutional objection to it as originally drawn. The power of the Federal Government to enter upon a policy of improving the public roads in the several States is not very clear in my mind, but it must be limited to those purposes enumerated in the Constitution. I think the Government clearly has the right to establish post roads and such other roads as may be used for interstate commerce. The other purposes mentioned in the bill are incidental to these purposes, and will not, I hope, prove to be a vital objection to the bill. I am in favor of this bill as it is amended, or proposed to be amended, because I believe we ought to go just as far as we can within constitutional limitations in improving the public roads of the country.

I am in favor of it because the people of the district which I have the honor to represent are deeply interested in the improvement of public highways. I am in favor of it, because it will encourage the people of the different States to help themselves in the improvement of their roads. The burden of building good roads is a heavy one—too heavy to be borne entirely by the people of the immediate vicinity of the roads. Where the roads are so constructed as to be beneficial to the country at large, as postal or interstate roads, I believe the Federal Government should aid in their construction. In Illinois we have a law under which the different counties can secure State aid to the extent of half the cost of the road, under certain conditions. We think this is a good law, for it has greatly encouraged the construction of hard roads. I believe this bill, if it passes, will likewise encourage the building of good roads all over the country, especially those roads that are used for post roads and for through travel or commerce between the States. And this leads me to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that I am in favor of this bill for another reason which has not been emphasized as much as I think it should have been by those who have spoken in favor of the bill. It will prove a great blessing to the rural mail carriers of the country. I had occasion recently to address a communication to all the rural mail carriers in my district—174 of them, I think—and I asked them this question: "Have you any suggestion as to the proposed legislation that would help the service?" The answer that came back from nearly every one of these rural carriers was, "Give us better roads."

And, Mr. Chairman, I think if there is a class of Government employees who, more than all others, deserve the consideration of this Congress, it is the men who deliver the mail over the country routes. [Applause.] They are the men who have to go out in all kinds of weather and deliver the mail to the homes of the people. The expense of maintaining their equipment, as I am informed by the carriers of my district, is from $300 to $600 per year, and a large part of this is due to the bad roads these men have to travel during at least a part of the year. And if we can adopt any legislation within constitutional limitations that will remove some of the burdens from the rural mail carriers of the country and make their lives and their labors better for them, I think we should do it. [Applause.]

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENISON. I will.

Mr. PLATT. Does not the gentleman think the Post Office Department could make their lives a little pleasanter if they tried?

Mr. DENISON. That may be true, that the Post Office Department might do so; but I do not believe the Post Office Department will do it, so I think Congress ought to do so. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, the rural carriers in my district deserve better conditions than they now have to labor under; they——

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I will.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I understand the gentleman from Illinois is favorable to this bill whether his amendment is adopted or not.

Mr. DENISON. Yes, sir; I am going to vote for it.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. And the gentleman in good faith believes the amount ought to be increased to $40,000,000?

Mr. DENISON. In answer to the gentleman's question, I will say that I believe the Appropriations Committee ought to be authorized to go that far. We are entering upon a new policy in passing this legislation. And while I do not believe it would be wise for the committee to recommend an appropriation of the full amount while the National Treasury is in the present impoverished condition, still, as I have already said, I hope and believe the time will soon come when we will return to our former method of raising revenue for the Government, and we will have a surplus in the Treasury to use for this purpose; and if we are going to start now and enter upon this new policy of aiding in improvement of the public roads, we ought to put the limit of the amount that can be appropriated high enough to do some good; the Appropriations Committee can then appropriate more for this worthy purpose when we do get into a better financial condition. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the people of Illinois, I am sure, would welcome Federal aid in the construction of the great Lincoln Highway, which is planned to cross this country from one coast to another. The agitation for this great highway has already encouraged the plans for other through highways which will prove to be a great benefit and blessing for the country. I have the honor to represent that old district in southern Illinois that was once represented in this House by Gen. John A. Logan. There are few, if any, names more sacred to the people of my district than that of Gen. Logan. There has already been planned and laid out another great interstate highway known as the Logan-Lee Highway, which begins somewhere away down in the heart of the country where the name of Lee is held so sacred, and runs north through the State where Logan lived, until it intercepts the Lincoln Highway. The people of my district and State, as well as of many others, are deeply interested in this great interstate road, which, while it may have in the beginning been somewhat inspired by sentiment, will just as surely result in a great material benefit to the people of the States through which it will pass. I am in favor of this bill, because I believe that the Federal Government should encourage and aid in the construction of such interstate highways, and I hope the amendment I have offered will be adopted and that the bill as amended will pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to amend the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana and Mr. SHACKLEFORD demanded a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I called for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 99.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the section strike out the period and insert the words: "And no appropriation shall be made during the year 1916."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I have long been an advocate of Federal aid for good roads. I advocated it long before I came to Congress, when the question of Federal power in this direction was not so generally admitted as it is now. I believe the pending bill is the best bill that has been before the Congress upon this subject [applause], but, Mr. Chairman, where is the money coming from to pay this $25,000,000 this year? I have listened to the debates which have gone on, and I have heard no suggestion from any source as to where the revenue is coming from to meet this expenditure now. Our Treasury to-day, Mr. Chairman, is practically empty. The deficit is growing from day to day and from month to month. In view of that situation, what is the duty of the Members of Congress in this regard? Is it to vote to launch into new fields of expenditure involving $25,000,000? Would a prudent business man conduct his own business in that way?

If any Member of Congress in his business life was met with the condition that we are confronted with in our Federal Treasury, would he begin a new expenditure, although it might be a wise policy under normal conditions? Would he do it, not knowing where the money was coming from to meet this new expenditure? Now, Mr. Chairman, the majority, it is true, is responsible not only for the appropriations that are made, but for the revenues to meet them; but at the same time, Mr. Chairman, every Member of this House has the responsibility upon his shoulders as to voting for appropriations. We on this side have no right to vote for every appropriation that comes before us and against every tax that comes before us and then afterwards go out upon the stump and charge the majority with not being able to conduct this Government in a competent way. [Applause.] And, Mr. Chairman, every Member of this House, it seems to me, in this crisis in our financial affairs, so far as the condition of the Treasury is concerned, ought to vote against every new field of expenditure that is not necessary. That means not only a vote for the amendment I have proposed, that simply provides no appropriation shall be made during the year 1916, but it means that he will not vote for any public-building bill involving new expenditures that are not necessary or a river-and-harbor bill, involving new projects that are not necessary, but will confine himself in voting for only necessary appropriations. And, Mr. Chairman, I want to remind the committee that the deficit that now exists in our financial affairs——

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Grows out of the ordinary expenditures of government.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. What is the deficit to-day?

Mr. LENROOT. I have not looked it up to-day.

Mr. GORDON. The surplus was $40,000,000 day before yesterday.

Mr. LENROOT. When I say the deficit, I mean the deficit that has grown up between the surplus that existed at the time the Democrats went into power and the surplus that exists to-day.

Mr. GORDON. What the gentleman means is there is no deficit, but an actual surplus of $40,000,000; but it is less than it was formerly? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LENROOT. What I mean is, if there had not been a large surplus when the Democrats came into power there would be an actual deficit in the Treasury to-day. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is the situation. What do you propose to do about it? As I said, these are ordinary expenditures. No one in this House believes for a moment, no matter what we think about preparedness, that the appropriations for naval and military purposes will be less than they were last year; and so with every other department of the Government. How, then, can you justify an expenditure, however wise it may be under normal conditions, that is not necessary now?

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is a plain, common-sense business proposition, and the Members of this House ought to be brave enough and courageous enough to face it as a business proposition. My district, Mr. Chairman, would benefit probably as much as any by the money that would be received from this appropriation this year, but I am satisfied that my constituents desire me to treat these great questions in a business way; and I am satisfied to leave the matter with them, so far as my individual vote is concerned upon the amendment I have proposed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, there is some force in the argument made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. He is very thoughtful and does not usually speak without saying something material, but this time I think he is unduly alarmed.

This is not an appropriation bill. It is a bill to authorize appropriations which shall be made by the proper appropriation committee and that has to go to the Senate and be there considered. If it should become a law at this session of Congress, it will be time enough for the watchful gentleman from Wisconsin to raise his objections against a bill reported by the proper appropriation committee. The appropriation committees are honest and faithful. Surely the Appropriation Committee would take into account the exigencies of the Treasury. We are asking here only for an authorization. If it shall pass both Houses and receive the signature of the President it will then be soon enough to consider whether we will make an appropriation this year or not, and, if so, the amount of such appropriation.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. We have fought it along for four or five years. Do not put this log across our pathway now. But if it becomes a law I will join the gentleman, or any other thoughtful gentleman, in safeguarding the Treasury. If an appropriation should be made under the authority we are seeking here to give, if one should be reported, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] can call on me to stand by him to see that no improper appropriation is made, taking into account the condition of the Treasury. But I ask him to impute to the Appropriation Committee just as much honesty and patriotism in that regard as he and I have ourselves. They will not make an appropriation if it is not warranted.

Mr. LENROOT. I do impute that same honesty; but the gentleman is aware, as I am aware, that the Appropriation Committee very properly, when we authorize an expenditure, deems it its duty to make the expenditure authorized by law.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, this does not provide that $25,000,000 shall be expended, but that the appropriation shall not in any year exceed $25,000,000, and if the money is not in the Treasury an appropriation committee would not be called upon to make an appropriation of that sum or of any other sum.

Mr. TILSON. May I ask the gentleman if this becomes a law will he ask the Appropriation Committee to make an appropriation this year?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Well, I do not know until I see what the amount of money is and how much we can expend and all conditions that surround it. If I think it is proper, I certainly would ask the Appropriation Committee to do it, but I would be governed by the exigencies of the situation.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman agree not to ask for any money this year?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Agree with whom?

Mr. TILSON. Well——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The House is not authorized to enter into any agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HAYES. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 101.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COLEMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

With the kindliest of feelings toward the able chairman of the Roads Committee, I direct his attention to the fact that he misquoted on this floor my statement made on Saturday last. I wish also to say that with the very high regard I have for the distinguished John Dalzell, who so ably and for so long represented his district in this House, I would dislike to think if he were present now he would cast his vote for this measure.

I wish also to inform the gentleman that I am a friend and not an enemy to the American farmer, and already in this House I have cast several ballots in the interest of that distinguished citizen of the Western States. But I rise now not to discuss this question of good roads nor to defend the State of Massachusetts, for, as a great statesman once said on this floor, she needs no defense. But I do rise to defend the principle that is involved—a great principle that had its development, if not its birth, in the great State of Massachusetts—and that is the principle of local self-government.

And this principle which has done so much for our whole country, while it carries with it privileges and advantages, also entails duties and responsibilities; and from the earliest history of the town government of New England, the caring for its highways has been a prominent feature.

The Puritans were to some extent trained in the principle of Democracy through the struggle with King James and the church. By reason of this struggle they discovered and adopted the principle of congregational independence. Each church was in itself a little republic, and from this practice probably came the principle of town government so peculiar to New England.

And here on the broad acres of this North American continent a splendid opportunity was afforded for the trial and development of this great experiment for the benefit of humanity.

So in Massachusetts this principle is firmly established. They have come honestly by it, and they have learned to love it for the things it has done. Had it not been for the privileges it afforded the individual the ranks of the emigrants in pioneer days would not have been so readily filled, and more, the quickness with which New England rose to strike for independence, giving courage and hope to the other colonies, was largely due to the splendid independence and individualism developed in the town governments of Massachusetts, and which government in somewhat modified form has been transplanted to other States in the form of township government.

I suggest to those who have so severely criticized Massachusetts not to be too caustic in their denunciation. Remember the sturdy, independent character of the New Englander, with his strong individuality, is traceable to the principle for which they now so stoutly contend and which principle contributed much to the splendid fight against an unjust principle of taxation in colonial days.

New England has a right to be proud of her numerous little republics, dotted as they are all over her various Commonwealths and in no State more developed than in Massachusetts, with the possible exception of Rhode Island, where the spirit of local independence is evident in the two capitals of that State.

And while we are in these days tending strongly toward centralization, so strongly, my friends, that if Hamilton himself could stop in and see us now he would be proud of his handiwork.

But let us, gentlemen, instead of heaping strictures on the Massachusetts Members for their stand, just recall what local self-government has done for our whole country and remembering the loyalty with which this principle was maintained by the immortal Jefferson as an antidote to the dangers of centralization, had we better not be careful of our action before ruthlessly brushing aside a principle so dear not only to New England but the people of this entire Nation? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. COLEMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COLEMAN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this section and amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] asks unanimous consent that the debate on this section and amendments thereto be now closed. Is there objection?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, does that exclude a substitute for the section?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] that we agree upon the time for closing debate.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the debate on this section close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I desire five minutes in which to discuss the amendment.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Then I withdraw my request, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's request is withdrawn. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUDDLESTON:

"Page 2, line 4, after the words 'fiscal year,' insert the words 'and no appropriation exceeding $5,000,000 shall be made for the year 1916.'"

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, the roads bill as it now stands authorizes an appropriation of $25,000,000 for the current year and for each subsequent year. My amendment, which has just been read, proposes to limit the appropriation for the current year to $5,000,000, so that the $25,000,000 appropriation will begin in 1917.

We are making an experiment with this roads bill. Why should we make such a colossal experiment? The law must be tried before we can know whether it is workable and will be satisfactory. There is no need to make the trial on such a large scale.

This bill has been criticized severely. It is said that it violates Democratic principles; that it places too much power in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture; that its intended benefits are too much bound up in red tape; that the control of its benefits will be in the hands of State highway boards and engineers who will distribute them not according to merit but as a matter of political favor. It is further charged that the bill is really an automobilists' bill and not a farmers' bill, and that it will result in the construction of trunk lines of road for the chief benefit of tourists and automobilists, and that the dirt roads and the bad roads back in the rural districts will not be able to get any of the money. These are serious criticisms and should not be dismissed lightly. They have been fortified on the floor of the House with logical arguments, and evidently there is basis for them. It must be admitted that we can not know how the law will work nor whether it will be satisfactory until it has been tried.

The $5,000,000 appropriated for 1916 will give an opportunity for the trial of the law. It will be ample for organization and experiment. The people will have notice of what they may expect and will be given an opportunity to avail themselves in future of the beneficent provisions of the bill.

It is an admitted fact that our National Treasury is not in good condition. Attention has been called in a very forcible way to the fact that our revenues are not sufficient to meet our expenses. That is a question that this Congress will have to wrestle with. Except for the fact that the European war found a surplus in the Treasury there would have been a deficit. This is indeed a serious situation.

The situation calls for the practice of rigid economy. The Democratic revenue law of 1913 was a success prior to the outbreak of the war. It was drafted to meet conditions as they were at that time. Since the outbreak of the war there has been a great falling off in revenues. This is due to the decrease in importations from which tariff duties would have been collected, and also a decrease in revenues from spirits, beer, and tobacco, caused by prohibition laws and by the hard times which decreased the consumption of such things.

Appropriations made by the present Congress must be provided for by the revenue bill which will be presented later. Normal conditions will not return to this country until the close of the European war. Our importations of foreign goods are yet far below normal. Those countries are unable to manufacture, prices are greatly increased, and it seems likely that it will be several years before our importations will reach their normal level. Until that time there should be the exercise of the strictest economy in national expenditures.

We can not spend money without first placing it in the Treasury. The only way that this can be done is by taxation, direct or indirect. Every appropriation which Congress makes means an added tax laid upon the people. The $25,000,000 appropriation for an experiment in national aid to roads represents heavier taxes which in all probability will be laid upon the necessaries of life. It means that the workingman must pay more for his clothing, food, and other necessaries of life. It must come out of the people and we should be careful how we spend this money. I am not willing to experiment on such a colossal scale when the cost must be borne by the masses. This experiment will perhaps mean the retention of the sugar duty, which means a tax of 1 cent per pound on every pound of sugar consumed in this country, an increase in the price of 1 cent per pound.

No necessity can be shown for the large appropriation of $25,000,000 for the first year. All large appropriations should be closely watched until that period when we may expect normal revenues from tariffs and from internal taxes. For these reasons I think the amendment which is in the interest of economy should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] to the committee amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the adoption of the committee amendment as previously amended.

The committee amendment as previously amended was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the whole bill, which I ask the Clerk to read. It is to strike out the enacting clause and insert the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MCKELLAR offers the following substitute for the whole bill: "Strike out all of the bill except the enacting clause and insert the following"——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that amendment is not in order. The House has just inserted, by way of amendment, section 1. It is too late to move to strike out a thing after the House has inserted it by a vote.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, then I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry as to when will be the proper time to offer the bill of last year as a substitute for the pending bill?

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the gentleman asking unanimous consent for leave to offer it now, as far as I am concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman that the proper time to offer a substitute will be after the bill has been read under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is my notion about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is the bill which we passed last year, which I have sent to the Clerk's desk to be read at this time, and I ask unanimous consent to offer it now as a substitute for the whole bill.

Mr. MANN. If we can avoid reading it, I shall not object.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I have no objection to the gentleman offering it, if it will not take too much time.

Mr. MANN. Let us dispose of it now.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] asks unanimous consent to offer a substitute for the whole bill at this time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Now, can we have a limit on the debate?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am perfectly willing. I want very little time myself.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Five minutes?

Mr. McKELLAR. If there is any gentleman on my side who wants to talk, I should like to see him have an opportunity. I do not want more than 5 minutes myself.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I should like 5 minutes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Then I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment be closed in 10 minutes, of which 5 minutes be yielded to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] and 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that the substitute be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Everybody knows about that bill, which is the one we passed last year, and I ask unanimous consent that it be offered without reading?

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the gentleman will not ask that, because I should like to have the bill read.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman wants to have it read, it is not very long.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is not very long, and I think the Members of the House ought to hear it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Then I will ask unanimous consent that the bill be read, and that there be 10 minutes' debate, of which 5 shall be yielded to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] and 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that there be 10 minutes' debate, to be divided between the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the proposed substitute, as follows:

That the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, may aid the States and the civil subdivisions thereof in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads in an amount not exceeding $25,000,000 in any fiscal year; that out of said amount which may be so expended in any fiscal year shall be paid the expenses incurred by the Secretary of Agriculture in the administration of this act, and that to administer the provisions of this act he is authorized to employ such engineering and other assistance and incur such expenses in the city of Washington and elsewhere as may be necessary; that after deducting from said $25,000,000 a sum sufficient to pay the expenses of administering this act by the Secretary of Agriculture the portion of the remainder which may be expended in any State in any fiscal year under the provisions of this act shall be determined upon the following basis, to wit: Sixty-five thousand dollars in each State and the balance in the respective States, one-half in the ratio which their total population bears to the total population of all of the States, as shown by the next preceding Federal census, and one-half in the ratio which their total mileage of rural post roads bears to the total mileage of rural post roads in all of the States, as shown by the report of the Postmaster General at the close of second quarter of the last preceding fiscal year; that on or before the 20th day of January in each year the Secretary of Agriculture shall prepare and file in his office a statement showing the amount which under the provisions of this act may be expended in each State during the next fiscal year and the proportions thereof which may be expended under section 3 and section 4 of this act and transmit by registered mail a copy of such statement to the governor of each State on or before the 31st day of said January: Provided, That for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1914, the Secretary of Agriculture shall so prepare and file said statement and transmit copies thereof to the governors of the respective States within 60 days after the final passage of this act: And provided further, That the term rural post roads, as used in this section, shall be held to mean any public road outside of incorporated cities over which the United States regularly carries rural mails either by free rural delivery or star-route carriers.

SEC. 2. That on or before the 1st day of January in each fiscal year each State highway commission, or in the event there is no such highway commission then the governor of each State in conformity to the laws of such State, or in the absence of any law of such State on the subject, may elect whether Federal aid to the construction and maintenance of rural post roads in such State shall be given under the provisions of section 3 or section 4 of this act, or partly under both sections and the proportion under each, by filing a written statement of such election in the office of the Secretary of Agriculture: Provided, That for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1916, such election shall be made within 45 days after the final passage of this act. If the said State highway commission, or where there is no such commission the governor of any State, shall refuse or fail to make such election as provided by this section, then within 10 days after the time in which said governor is authorized to make such election has elapsed the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine said matter.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cooperate with the officers of the several States having lawful authority in that behalf in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads. That between the 1st day of February and the 30th day of June in each fiscal year the Secretary of Agriculture and the officer, or officers, of each State having lawful power to act for the State may jointly consider and determine the roads in such State which, under the provisions of this section, may be constructed and maintained during the next fiscal year and the material, character, and manner of such construction and maintenance; that the several States shall afford such inspection and supervision of said construction and maintenance as shall be required by the Secretary of Agriculture; that in no case shall the United States bear more than one-half of the cost of the construction and maintenance of any road under the provisions of this section; that the Secretary of Agriculture shall not commence such joint construction of any road in any State until the portion of the cost thereof which is to be provided otherwise than by the United States has been made available.

SEC. 4. That certain roads in the States which are adapted to use by the United States as rural post roads shall be divided into three classes to be known as class A, class B, and class C.

Class A shall embrace roads upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track composed of macadam or other material of equal utility and cost, constructed and maintained in such manner that it shall have a smooth, firm surface.

Class B shall embrace roads upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track composed of shells, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay or other material of equal utility but less expensive than macadam, constructed and maintained in such manner that it shall have a smooth, firm surface.

Class C shall embrace roads upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with adequate drainage and ample side ditches, with a roadway constructed so as to quickly shed water into the side ditches and kept crowned and compacted by dragging or other adequate means so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles.

That on or before the 1st day of March in each fiscal year the governor of any State may file in the office of the Secretary of Agriculture a statement setting forth the location and the number of miles of roads in such State which he claims to be in each of classes A, B, and C, respectively; and if such State have a State highway department then his said statement may be accompanied by a report from such State highway department showing the total number of miles of roads in such State in each of classes A, B, and C, the location of such roads, a description in detail of their physical features, the material, manner, and, as far as may be, the cost of their construction and the manner and cost of their maintenance.

That the Secretary of Agriculture shall consider such statements and determine which of the roads mentioned therein are in class A, which in class B, and which in class C, and make a report of his said determinations to the respective governors, filing such statements, on or before the 20th day of the following June.

That no charge shall be made for so considering and determining such statement of any governor if the same shall be accompanied by a report from the State highway department of such State as hereinbefore provided; but in all other cases there shall be deducted 10 per cent of the amount which shall be payable on account of the roads in such State under the provisions of this act.

That at the end of each fiscal year the United States shall pay on account of the roads so determined to be in classes A, B, and C, as follows: On each mile in class A the sum of $60, on each mile in class B the sum of $30, and on each mile in class C the sum of $15: Provided, That if in any State the aggregate of said sums would exceed the amount which for that fiscal year has been apportioned to such State under this act to be expended under the provisions of this section, then said sums per mile shall be reduced pro rata so that their aggregate shall not exceed said amount.

That nothing whatever shall be paid by the United States under the provisions of this section for any road which does not clearly come within the requirements of class A, B, or C as hereinbefore defined.

That such payments shall be made to such officers in the respective States as the governors thereof shall indicate as being lawfully entitled to receive the same by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Secretary of Agriculture: Provided, That this act shall not be construed as authorizing any governor to create any new office.

That such payments of money made by the United States as hereinbefore provided shall, during the ensuing fiscal year, be applied to the construction, maintenance, or extension of the respective roads for which paid and that in addition thereto the State or civil subdivisions thereof shall, during said ensuing fiscal year, expend in the construction, maintenance, or extension of said roads an amount equal to the amount so paid by the United States; that if such sums are not so expended upon the construction, maintenance, or extension of said roads, respectively, during the ensuing fiscal year, then at the end of such fiscal year nothing whatever shall be paid by the United States on account of any road upon which there has been a default in such expenditure; that the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine whether such expenditures have been so made, and to aid him in such determinations that the proper officers of the State shall make such showing as he shall require.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall have power to make all needful rules for the proper administration of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 6. That necessary bridges and culverts shall be deemed to be a part of the respective roads constructed, improved, or maintained under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 7. That this act shall be in force from and after July 1, 1916.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, the bill that has just been read as a substitute for the pending bill is precisely the same bill, word for word and letter for letter, except that 1916 is substituted for 1914, as the bill that was passed last year by a vote of about 7 to 1. It is almost precisely the same as the bill that was passed two years ago in a preceding Congress by quite a large majority. The difference between the two measures is this: This substitute has all of the provisions about State highway commissions and the designation of certain roads to be approved by the Secretary of Agriculture that the present bill has. In addition it has a provision that all the roads of the country shall be divided into three classes—class A, class B, and class C. The State can elect to have the funds expended for upkeep on all of the roads in the State or district or it can leave the matter to the State highway commissions just as reported by the committee. What is the difference in practical language? It is simply this, that one of these bills, the substitute bill I offer and the one you passed last year, is really and truly a bill for the benefit of the farmers of the country, for the country people through which the roads pass. The present bill is a bill for the automobile associations, to a very large extent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; but I wish the gentleman would be brief, for I have only five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The substitute offered is the bill that was passed last year?

Mr. McKELLAR. Word for word and letter for letter except that 1916 is substituted for 1914.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman lives in a farming community and has just gone through a very interesting campaign.

Mr. McKELLAR. Quite the contrary; I represent Memphis, Tenn., one of the largest cities in the South.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let me ask the gentleman, Was this an issue in his campaign?

Mr. McKELLAR. It was.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And did the farmers in his section want this kind of a bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. They did; the farmers want this kind of a bill, if I am any judge. I want to tell you why. Under the present bill it depends upon the local State highway commission whether any particular district gets a dollar of this money. That commission has a right under this bill to select the particular roads they can spend the money on. They can spend the money on one road or in one or three counties in the State. Your district may be left out entirely under the terms of this bill. If you pass this bill, there may be some trouble at home. Now, this substitute provides that all the people shall receive the benefits of this act, and the money is to be distributed in a more equitable way, or distributed in a way that we believe will be a great incentive to road building, not in a special locality but in all parts of each State.

It is a question for you to determine whether you are going back on what you did four years ago or two years ago and adopt a different system. The present bill is for the benefit of certain roads, largely automobile roads, and the substitute is for the benefit of the whole people. I want to say frankly that if the substitute is voted down, I am going to vote for the bill reported out of the committee. Why? I am for road building just as I am for education. I will vote for any kind of a road bill just as I will vote for any kind of an educational bill, because I believe that the best way to aid the people is to build up the educational facilities of our country and to build up the roads of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, one can do but little in the brief space of five minutes toward affording a full and sufficient answer to the contentions of a speech like that of the gentleman from Tennessee which is related to, and concerned with a bill not before the House, and one moreover with respect to which a large portion of this body is not informed. In the exceedingly limited time at my disposal I will give the best answer that I can to objections, to the pending measure urged by the gentleman from Tennessee. These objections, I maintain are not well taken.

As a Member of this House, I have been a friend of Federal aid to roads for a longer time than my friend from Tennessee and actively concerned during that period in the preparation of the bills that have embodied this principle. I do not think that anyone who is acquainted with my record would accuse me of reporting, or otherwise indorsing a bill that favors the automobile interests as against those of the farmers. The fact about this bill, or rather the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee is that it appears to have entered into a party fight in the State of Tennessee, as a sort of campaign issue. But this fact does not furnish a sufficient ground for replacing the committee bill, with the pending substitute. We have tried to point out the reasons that impelled the committee to report the pending bill in its present form. The bill of last year was a good one, but the bill of this year is better, and one that in the light of our last year's experience we consider more likely of passage. The situation therefore that confronts the committee is whether we will reject the substitute and pass a bill that we have reason to believe will be successful in the other body, or accept the substitute of our friend, in order to meet the local exigencies in Tennessee, and thereby imperil the entire measure, at the other end of the Capitol. The bill of last session contained two sections in the alternative, one relating to the construction of roads by the Federal Government and the States, in cooperation——

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have but five minutes and can not yield—and the other classifying the roads, with a view to the payment of certain fixed sums by the Federal Government, in the way of maintenance. The classification clause was opposed by the Department of Agriculture, and was the subject of bitter attack upon this floor. Further it was strenuously assailed in the Senate of the United States. Having all of this in mind, and desiring to pass at some early date in the House a bill that would stand a reasonable chance of enactment by this Congress, we eliminated section 4 of the bill of last year, the classification section, and amplified section 3, so as to make it the pending bill. This section provides as efficiently for the farmers as it is possible for any bill to do, that embodies the principle of Federal aid, and at the same time is concerned with being fair to all the interests and all the sections, of all the country. I am opposed to imperiling a good bill, merely to meet a local situation in one State, as developed by the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the reply of the gentleman from Tennessee. Most emphatically, this is not an automobile bill. Take this measure just as it has been reported, and it will be noted that the selection of the roads to be built, or maintained, is left to the road departments of the several States. Hence the quota of each State will be applied in conformity with the policy of that State. For instance, the quota of the State of Massachusetts from which we have heard so copiously this evening, will be administered by the local authorities of that State.

If Massachusetts favors automobile roads, I am free to say that it will be possible under the operation of this bill for Massachusetts to apply every dollar of her quota toward the construction of automobile roads, unless checked in this direction by the veto of the Agricultural Department. On the other hand if the policy of that State favors the application of her quota in aid of a general system of roads for the benefit of all the people of that State, farmers included, I undertake to say that this bill will fit in with that policy.

I desire to say one thing further in this connection, and that is that all of the objections urged to this measure by the Representatives from the great cities of the Union have been founded upon an absolute misapprehension of the scope and purpose of the bill. This bill is not a sectional measure. It was not conceived in antagonism to the cities, or designed to hinder their development. Further while it may be applied in one State upon any one type of roads preferred by that State, it was not designed with a view to favoring any special type of road construction. It was designed for the exclusive benefit of neither the cities, the automobile concerns, nor I may say, the farmers. On the other hand it is a bill that by reason of its flexible capacity of adaptation to the local policies of the several States concerned in road improvement will concurrently benefit the cities, the farmers, and if, you please, the automobile concerns, and the automobile owners, since you can not construct even a purely farmer's road without an incidental benefit to the concerns that build, and the citizens who operate that wonder-worker of the day, the modern automobile.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUCKER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 7617 and had come to no resolution thereon.

REFERENCE OF CONTESTED-ELECTION CASES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following reference of contested-election cases.

The Clerk read as follows:

To Mr. FOCHT, on account of death in his family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the American merchant marine.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman to extend his remarks in the RECORD? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a statement of Senator VARDAMAN on the subject of the national defense.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it appears to me it would be out of order for the House to extend a request to insert certain remarks of a United States Senator when, with all due respect to that great body, they use most of the space in the RECORD already for stating their views. Unless there would be some special reason why this should be done, I certainly would be impelled to object.

Mr. MANN. I was going to ask where was this speech made?

Mr. BAILEY. This was a statement given out to the press.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I think I shall have to object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] objects.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 25, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we know that every path of human activity leads to Thy throne. We have never been able to get away from the consciousness of human responsibility. Thou hast taught us to look forward to the judgment of our own lives without fear. Thou hast taught us that our lives will be in review before Thee. The ideals that we seek to work into the plan of human life and government are derived from Thee, and that which we write into law must stand the test of the divine law. Grant us Thy grace to see the larger meaning of life and law in the light of Thy life and of Thy law. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LIST OF CLAIMS (S. DOC. NO. 255).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to law, schedules of claims amounting to $47,525.33 allowed by the several accounting officers of the Treasury Department under provisions the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund under the provisions of section 5 of the act of June 20, 1874, etc., which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

LIST OF JUDGMENTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to law, a list of judgments rendered against the Government by the district courts of the United States under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, submitted by the Attorney General, and which require an appropriation for their payment, etc., amounting to $5,006.89 (S. Doc. No. 253), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to law, a list of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims amounting to $27,695.12, which have been presented to the department and require an appropriation for their payment (S. Doc. No. 252), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

FOREIGN COMMERCIAL SERVICE.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a communication from the General Secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, transmitting a tabulation of a referendum vote on the question of making a marked increase in the development of the foreign commercial service of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce in the Department of Commerce and the Consular Service in the Department of State, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MYERS. I present a petition from the city and county officials of Montana, in convention assembled, praying for an appropriation of $1,000,000 for the Flathead Reclamation project in that State. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD, together with the signatures of the chairman and the secretary, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the President and Congress of the United States:

The city officials, county assessors, county commissioners, county clerks and recorders, county treasurers, county surveyors, and county auditors of all the cities and counties of this State, in joint convention assembled at Butte, Mont., most urgently request the President and the Congress of the United States for an appropriation of $1,000,000 for construction work on the Flathead irrigation project, to be passed by this session of Congress for work during the current year.

The estimated cost for this project is $6,500,000, and Government reports show that the project is less than 25 per cent completed, and at the present rate of receiving appropriations it will require 25 years to complete the project.

The settlers entered upon these lands at the urgent request of the Government, under promise that their lands would be irrigated and opportunity afforded them to provide a living for their families and make payments on their land.

The dilatory methods of the Government in handling this project has been manifestly unfair, and they feel that the Government should come to their assistance and make appropriations that will assure completion of the project in an economical and businesslike manner, thereby insuring water at an early date and greatly reducing the cost per acre of this project. The lax methods of the Government are resulting in the absolute confiscation of the settlers' rights and property.

In view of the foregoing facts, we do most urgently request that a large appropriation looking toward the speedy and economical completion of this project be passed by this session of Congress.

Respectfully submitted.

DAVE KEHOE, Chairman.
ROBT. LEAVENS, Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be printed as a public document, then.

FLOOD AT YUMA, ARIZ.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I introduce a joint resolution, which I should like to have the Secretary read, as I purpose to ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 86) for repair and rebuilding of the levee at Yuma, Ariz., was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas a flood in the Gila River has destroyed the levee erected by the Government at the town of Yuma, Ariz.; and

Whereas the waters from said river are overflowing the said town and destroying the property of its citizens; and

Whereas the waters of said flood are now 5 feet or more in depth over the business center of said town; and

Whereas the said flood waters, if not quickly restrained, will ruin the people and now threatens to ruin the Government irrigation project at said city: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for the repair and rebuilding of said levee; that said sum shall be immediately available and the work shall be done and money expended by the director of the irrigation project stationed at said town or by any engineer detailed at once by the Secretary of War for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The joint resolution has not been to a committee?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No; it has never been referred. I will state to the Senator that I received only yesterday evening a telegram from the mayor of Yuma. I wish the Secretary would read the telegram for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

YUMA, ARIZ., January 24, 1916.

Senator MARK SMITH,
Washington, D. C.:

Government levee built 25 years ago for protection of Yuma broken by floods. Business section of town under 5 feet of water. More than half of the buildings collapsed and great distress and loss to every inhabitant here. Please procure immediately $50,000 for reconstruction of good levee. Kindly answer by wire what you can and will do for immediate action. This levee is not under the jurisdiction of the Reclamation Service.

W. A. MOSER, Mayor.
J. A. DONOVAN,
Chairman Board of Supervisors.
E. S. KIRKPATRICK,
President Commercial Club.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senate, before the matter is submitted for its decision, that 20 years ago or more a levee was built for the protection of Yuma against the rising waters of the Gila River, on the banks of which stream the city is located. There is a vast irrigation project there known as the Yuma project.

An unprecedented fall of snow, followed by warm rains from the mighty watershed of the Gila, the Salt, the Colorado, and their tributaries, has brought down an enormous flood, which has broken this dike, and the city to-day is under 5 feet of water.

I know, under the rule, the joint resolution ought to go to a committee. I am informed, as my colleague is informed, by various telegrams of these facts; and inasmuch as the Government is taking three-fourths of the valuable lands of the State for its own purposes, and now proposes to rent the balance for its own use, I think it is nothing but proper to these people that we should forego the question of a mere reference of the joint resolution to a committee. The impossibility of quick action under the circumstances arises in the outset from the difficulty of getting the committee together, and while we are going through with this program the people there will be drowned out. That can be prevented by providing for a sufficient number of men to do the work. The people are ruined by the flood and have not the money to do it for themselves. I hope there will be no objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the present consideration of the joint resolution, but I want to know from the Senator if any of this money is to be used for the amelioration of the condition of the people whose property has been destroyed? Are those people suffering for the necessities of life now?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have no doubt about their suffering.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want to ask the Senator further, can this work be done immediately—before the flood goes down—and if not, are such floods very frequent there?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The floods are not frequent. The levee has prevented flooding of the city on ordinary risings of the river; but this is an extraordinary occasion. The whole of the northern part of the State of Arizona is under water at this time, the flood being occasioned by the melting of snows, of which I have spoken. If we can get this assistance, we can now stop the flood from overflowing further the levee. We can get the men if we can get money enough there to stop it, and thus save the people from absolute destruction and from want for the necessities of life, which must follow the destruction of their homes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona will understand that I am not opposing the consideration or the passage of the joint resolution; but I thought, as it proposed to provide for the construction of a levee, that it would hardly be necessary to take such expeditious action. If, however, the Senator assures me that it is for the protection of those people, I shall have no objection to the prompt consideration of the measure.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The joint resolution itself explains that it is for the protection of the people. When all property of the victims of this unfortunate condition shall have been swept away—as it will if this relief is delayed—then they must become, many of them, the objects of our solicitude and perhaps of charity.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Arizona if he will further assure us that there is no "pork" in this proposition? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If there were, I should not object to the passage of the resolution when I consider how Arizona has been treated by the Federal Government, and the condition of those for whom I plead. The Senator who asks assurance that there is no "pork" in the proposition does so in good nature, and probably to call attention to the injustice done certain bills in which he and his constituents are interested almost as deeply as I feel on the pending resolution. I accept his pleasantry in the spirit which animates his inquiry. But this is no matter to call forth even pleasant inquiry, for I see, and hope every Senator here will see, the tragedy hanging over my friends and constituents in this hour of their distress.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am especially interested in this very matter, but I do not believe that it is right to have a joint resolution offered in the Senate and considered immediately, without being referred to a committee, when, under the rules, it should be so referred. The committee can act within four or five hours if the emergency is such as to justify it.

Mr. President, rather than to have the rules violated, notwithstanding I am interested in the passage of the resolution, I shall object to its immediate consideration, or until it has been considered by a committee of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I should like to ask the Senator, if the Senate will bear with me a moment, how are we going to get the committee together to-day? Those people in Arizona are being drowned out of their homes.

Mr. SMOOT. I think, Mr. President, that the Senator can get the committee together.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not think so, for I have tried it often enough, and have found it impossible to get any committee together under such circumstances.

Mr. SMOOT. I believe the Senator can get the committee together if the emergency is such as he has here described it.

Mr. President, I do not believe that we ought to begin this proposed system of legislating. We have committees for the consideration of legislation; under the rules this joint resolution should go to a committee, and for that reason I ask that it be referred.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If it were a question of saving a man from hanging, then I suppose the question should go to a committee while the execution was going on.

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, while this discussion is out of order, if I may have unanimous consent for a few minutes, I should like to submit some brief observations in connection with the request preferred by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH].

If this matter is to be acted on at all without conformity to established procedure, it must be done quickly and by an entire suspension of the rules and regulations which govern the expenditure of public money for the purposes indicated in the joint resolution. A system has grown up that, I think, is entirely too restrictive of the rights of Congress, but it is recognized as a system, and its rules and limitations are applied in all cases that come up where a state of facts similar to those recited in the preamble of the joint resolution exists.

The conditions at Yuma can be duplicated 50 times over in different sections of the country. I recall a situation down on the Red River, in Arkansas, in Texas, and in Louisiana, where similar conditions have occurred not only once but half a dozen times in the last two years; but fettered, as we have been, by the regulations imposed by Congress itself we have been unable to get any relief, or the hope of it. If this particular case in Arizona appeals more strongly than cases elsewhere, I am perfectly willing to make an exception by keeping my mouth shut here; but if the joint resolution goes to the Committee on Commerce it will take the usual course, which is to send it to the War Department for a report from the Engineers, and much will depend upon the character of the report that is made.

It is not a fact that Congress has up to this time committed itself to building levees for the mere purpose of protecting cities against inundation or the ravages of overflow.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will permit me, I can make that clearer to him by referring him to what Congress has already done.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I will be through in a few seconds.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. This levee was built by Congress itself not for the purpose simply of protecting the city, but for the purpose of protecting the Government's own land.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Irrigation projects are built out of a special fund consisting of the proceeds——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Oh, this has nothing to do with irrigation.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I thought the Senator stated that it would likely affect irrigation works.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is likely that the waters will flow across into irrigation works.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I probably relied more upon the recitals of the preamble than I did upon the statement of the Senator. I certainly do not want to put the Senator in the attitude of making statements that I question, because I do not.

If the matter is of that supreme urgency that appeals strongly to the sense of liberality on the part of Congress, then it ought to be whipped through without any word about it; but if it is to take the regular course, I notify the Senate now that that course has been subjected to many limitations that at times have proved inconvenient. I think they are too restrictive, and I think sooner or later the whole subject will have to be presented to Congress for relaxation of the restrictions that are now imposed upon the Committee on Commerce and upon the Congress of the United States. In attempting to escape the complaints represented by the universal outcry against the "pork" proposition in connection with the river and harbor bill we have created another institution that is no better than the pork system; and as between the two systems I think the pork system a better one than the one we have got now, because it is subjected to all sorts of favoritism and we have been confronted habitually with reports in favor of some propositions and unfavorable reports in connection with better ones; but as long as it is a system recognized by Congress and finding its authority in a solemn statute passed by Congress and approved by the President, I think we must pay some attention to it.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is entirely right. The showing made in the telegram which has been read is not different from showings that can be made elsewhere, and does not approach in any possible degree the ravages from the sudden overflows that recently took place on the Ohio River and sections of the country there.

I could detain the Senate longer if I felt disposed to bring to its notice all the instances where damage has been inflicted upon the people and upon their property by sudden visitations in the form of overflows. If the Senator from Utah persists in his objection—and it is a very proper one, though, probably, I would not make it; but, being made, I have no hesitancy in saying it is a very proper one; and when it is made the proposition will have to undergo the routine established by Congress in such cases.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, that statement of the Senator from Arkansas shows the Senator from Utah just what I apprehended when I asked for unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution. If the joint resolution goes to the committee—and there is involved three or four days waiting for a report from the War Department and reports from the committees of Congress—it will be too late to do anything about it, so far as the people in the neighborhood of Yuma, Ariz., are concerned, for that river is still rising, according to the last reports I have had.

This case does not in any way stand on all fours with any other problem in the United States. Arizona is a State that had been held as a Territory for many years, and almost every resource of that State has been taken by the Federal Government, and the action sought to be taken will be along the line of protecting Federal property almost to as great an extent as it will be toward protecting individuals and the town of Yuma.

As I have said, the Federal Government has taken our lands and Arizona has only very limited resources. We can tax only our towns, our herds, and our mines; the Government has the balance of the valuable land, and is now going to take the rest of it; is going to impound our own waters and use them as it pleases, according to the terms of a bill now before this Congress. In that aspect of the case, with an emergency facing us, with distress and ruin confronting the people of the city, the Government itself, having built the original levee to protect its own property, as well as that of the city, and that levee having broken, with the consequence that there is an unprecedented flood there, I am going to say, with this condition facing me, that unless we can get relief this morning, probably it will come a long while too late.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, while I am in full sympathy with all the Senator from Arizona has stated, it does not change the condition one particle so far as the Senate of the United States is concerned.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator will wait a moment; I will not take more than a minute.

Another consideration, Mr. President, is that if this joint resolution goes to the House of Representatives the same information will be asked for by the House before it will pass upon it. Therefore, it will not hasten the passage of the resolution one hour to have it considered now without reference to the committee, and consequently I think that it just as well for the information to be secured by the Senate committee as to have it secured by the House committee, because it will have to be secured at last before the resolution can pass the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will go to the Committee on Commerce, then.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Do I understand that the Senator from Utah has objected?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. I feel compelled to do so.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I deplore, but can not prevent, the Senator's action. I will try to get early action by the committee.

THE FRIGATE "CONSTITUTION."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution offered by me yesterday, which went over, be now laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 76) submitted by Mr. GALLINGER on the 24th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to communicate to the Senate all facts bearing on the present condition of the frigate Constitution, now lying in the Charles River, Boston, and also an estimate of the amount of money that will be required to put the frigate in a condition of good repair, with a view of retaining the vessel as a historic relic of the early days of the American Navy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, pursuant to the notice given yesterday, I ask that Order of Business No. 33, being Senate joint resolution 60, which was under consideration yesterday, be now taken up.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 60) creating a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Senate Committee on Interstate Comerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the first amendment offered by the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, this joint resolution provides for the investigation by a joint committee, made up of members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House and of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, to determine what further legislation, if any, should be passed by Congress relating to interstate and foreign commerce. The joint resolution also defines the power of that committee.

Mr. President, if I were satisfied that this joint resolution, if passed, would not be used as a buffer to prevent any legislation along the lines of the proposed investigation, I would have no objection to it, and I would not put anything in the way of the proposed joint committee in getting any information that it might be able to secure by means of such investigation; but, in my judgment, if we pass this joint resolution, we will be continually met with an objection to the passage of any further legislation regarding interstate railroads and the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the statement will be made that such legislation should not be taken up until this investigation has been completed.

It is the opinion, I understand, of those who are behind the joint resolution—and I am satisfied that they are right in that respect—that this investigation will take a great deal of time; that it will run beyond this session of Congress at least. I judge from the remarks of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] that it is deemed wise by those who father the joint resolution that legislation affecting railroads engaged in interstate commerce should not be undertaken now because a presidential campaign is coming on, and we can not legislate in as sober-minded a condition as though such a campaign were not coming on.

Mr. President, that objection can be urged against practically all legislation of a general character that can prossibly be proposed. That objection, if good, can be urged against the Philippine bill that we now have as the unfinished business before the Senate. That objection can be urged against the rural-credit legislation that we are expected to take up soon. That objection can be raised against the bill now on the calendar, reported from the Committee on Commerce, regarding the building of dams for the purpose of developing electric power on navigable streams; and the same objection can be urged against the bill that was reported this morning from the Committee on Public Lands providing for the building of dams upon streams upon public lands.

So that it seems to me, if the objection of the Senator from Nevada is good, that, on account of a political contest that is coming on next summer and next fall, we should not pass this legislation, then we might just as well adjourn now and go home. The objection will apply to a great many of the appropriations that will be contained in the various appropriation bills that will be before the Senate.

I would be glad indeed, Mr. President, if we could consider this legislation, as well as all other legislation, free and absolutely divorced from any question of politics. According to my idea, we ought to consider all legislation free from partisan influence; but if partisan influence is going to interfere with this legislation, I see no reason why it will not to the same extent interfere with all legislation, at least all legislation of a general character. If I had my way, there would be no partisanship in this Chamber in the consideration of any legislation of any character.

Soon after the present administration went into office a bill was introduced in the House of Representatives the effect of which was to give the Interstate Commerce Commission power to regulate the issuing of stocks and bonds by interstate railroads. This bill was introduced partly, I presume, if not entirely, on account of a pledge made in the Democratic platform that the Democratic Party would enact such legislation if given the power. With that part of the Democratic platform I was then and am now in entire accord.

This bill passed the House of Representatives after a great deal of consideration there. It came to the Senate and was referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee. They had extended hearings on the bill and reported it to the Senate. It was on the calendar of the Senate during the first session of Congress after the incoming of the present administration. It remained there until that session adjourned. It remained there during the entire short session, and no effort whatever was made to pass the bill.

I have always regretted, and have so expressed myself to a great many of my Democratic friends in this body, that some action was not taken upon this bill; but it seems that all at once a change came over the majority, and they decided that the bill should not become a law. There is no doubt but what the strong hand which stopped the progress of this legislation was extended across its path from the White House. While the Senator from Nevada regrets that if legislation of this kind should be taken up now politics might enter into it, I fear that if not the object, at least the real thing that is intended to be accomplished by this resolution is partisan. I fear that it is going to be used by the Democratic Party in the coming campaign as an excuse for not legislating not only upon that subject but upon others. It seems to me, therefore, that there is more politics in passing it than there is in defeating it.

The Democratic platform adopted at the Baltimore convention contained this provision:

> We favor such legislation as will effectually prohibit the railroads, express, telegraph, and telephone companies from engaging in business which brings them into competition with their shippers or patrons; also legislation preventing the overissue of stocks and bonds by interstate railroads.

I presume the President of the United States was trying to avoid the consequences of that particular provision of the platform when, on December 7, 1915, in his official message to Congress he used this language:

> In the meantime may I make this suggestion? The transportation problem is an exceedingly serious and pressing one in this country. There has from time to time of late been reason to fear that our railroads would not much longer be able to cope with it successfully as at present equipped and coordinated. I suggest that it would be wise to provide for a commission of inquiry to ascertain by a thorough canvass of the whole question whether our laws as at present framed and administered are as serviceable as they might be in the solution of the problem.

Further on he says:

> It seems to me that it might be the part of wisdom, therefore, before further legislation in this field is attempted, to look at the whole problem of coordination and efficiency in the full light of a fresh assessment of circumstance and opinion as a guide to dealing with the several parts of it.

I presume, Mr. President, that this resolution has been introduced by the Senator from Nevada with a view to carrying out that recommendation of the President. In other words, the President advised that before any further legislation be had an investigation should be had; and now we are brought face to face with the proposition that in carrying out that suggestion we shall enter upon an investigation that will perhaps take up two or three years. At least, it will go beyond the campaign now before us.

But, Mr. President, in connection with the President's advice that we should not further legislate on these matters, I want to read from another message that he delivered soon after he became President, while perhaps the pledge in the Democratic platform was fresher in his mind. That was on January 20, 1914. The one I have read from was delivered December 7, 1915, nearly two years after this from which I shall now read. In that official message the President used the following language:

> In the second place, business men as well as those who direct public affairs now recognize, and recognize with painful clearness, the great harm and injustice which has been done to many, if not all, of the great railroad systems of the country by the way in which they have been financed and their own distinctive interests subordinated to the interests of the men who financed them and of other business enterprises which those men wished to promote. The country is ready, therefore, to accept, and accept with relief as well as approval, a law which will confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to superintend and regulate the financial operations by which the railroads are henceforth to be supplied with the money they need for their proper development to meet the rapidly growing requirements of the country for increased and improved facilities of transportation.

Between the delivery to Congress of this message in which the President advocates this legislation, and the other message, delivered over a year later, in which he asks us not to legislate but to investigate, what has taken place? Instead of this committee being appointed to investigate as provided in this resolution, we ought to have the committee investigate to see why the President changed his mind. We ought to have the committee investigate to give information to the country as to why, following soon after his election to that great office, he advocated in good faith carrying out that provision of the platform upon which he was elected, and then, in the face of the next campaign in which he wants to be reelected, he comes again officially before Congress and asks us to stay our hands. There is fruitful ground for investigation if this committee wants to undertake it.

Mr. President, I propose to show that the President knew what he said and was right in the message that he delivered in December, 1914, and that he had absolutely closed his eyes in the face of abundant evidence, for some reason known to himself alone, when he delivered the other. If you will search through his messages, you will find at no place any reason that he has given why he wanted to confer that authority upon the Interstate Commerce Commission in December, 1914, and why he wanted to withhold it in June, 1915.

Mr. President, for many years the Interstate Commerce Commission has been asking Congress for authority to superintend the issuing of stocks and bonds by interstate railroads. There is an abundance of evidence officially in the records of the Interstate Commerce Commission to convince any man, I think, that there is some legislation, as the President said in his message, that ought to be enacted. He said, in December, 1914—

> Business men * * * recognize, and recognize with painful clearness, the great harm and injustice which has been done to many, if not all, of the great railroad systems by the way in which they have been financed and their own distinctive interests subordinated to the interests of the men who financed them.

I am going to show, I think, that that was and is the case. I want to say, to begin with, that I would not go as far as the President did in his condemnation of the financial conditions of the railroads. It may be that he had more information than I have. If he did, there is all the more reason why there should be an investigation made as to why he has taken it all back. I would not charge, as he intimates—he does not charge it directly, but he intimates—that this has been true of many, if not all, of the great railroad systems.

Mr. President, as far as I know, there are many of the great railroad systems of the country that are operated upon an honest, fair business basis; and it is only because I should like to see remedied the condition that has applied in the past to some of the railroads, by which financial pirates have ruined some of the greatest railroad systems of the world, that I am taking the floor now and calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that no investigation is necessary. Investigations have been made, and I am going to produce to-day some of the evidence that those investigations have brought forth.

Every railroad, being a quasi-public institution, ought to be managed with absolute honesty. Many of the difficulties with which honest railroads as well as others have been confronted have come about because of the rotten financial management and control that has resulted in the ruination of some great systems of railroads and in taking away from thousands and thousands of honest stockholders the earnings of a lifetime.

Every railroad stock and every railroad bond ought to be as substantial and as good as a Government bond. If we had honest management of the finances of the railroads of our country, that would be the case. Then any man with savings, any trustee with trust funds, would be able to invest in the stocks or bonds of railroads knowing that the investment was going to be honestly dealt with, honestly handled, and that there would be no danger of some financial manipulation going on behind the scenes by which he might be absolutely ruined. As it has been, it has been more or less a gambling operation to invest in stocks or bonds of interstate railroads.

That is the condition I want to remedy, and I am appearing now as a friend to honest railroads. I should like to have a law passed that would put behind the bars men who steal millions, the same as you put behind the bars men who steal pennies.

Mr. President, the Interstate Commerce Commission transmitted a report January 26, 1914, showing the result of their investigation of several railroads known as the Frisco System. I am only going to quote brief extracts from these various reports, because if I made no attempt to brief it would take days to produce all the evidence that is at hand. They say:

> The difficulties of the Frisco were of a financial and not of an operating character.

There is the difficulty. That has been the cause of the downfall of railroads. That is the reason why honest railroads often have a difficult time to get money. It is because honest people are afraid to invest their money in the stocks and bonds.

In this Frisco case the Interstate Commerce Commission go on to show how the men who were controlling the finances of the railroads ruined it; how they organized syndicates composed of financial men outside and the officers of the railroad itself inside, and through these syndicates bought and invested in various things—branch railroads, stocks, and bonds. After summarizing various of these investments they sum up one part of their report as follows:

> The profits realized by syndicates and trust companies on the sale of the Frisco were as follows.

Then they itemize the different corporations in which they had improperly and wrongfully invested the money which belonged to the stockholders, making a total loss in that one item alone of $8,444,706.51.

They go into details with some of the companies. Here is one of them, and I am going to read only their conclusion. After they had examined the evidence and made an investigation of one company they say:

> Organizing the new company and disposing of the securities through this syndicate was not a labor of love on the part of those who composed the syndicate. The commissions received by them amounted to $494,894.44, and their profits on subscriptions were $1,783,207.15.

This syndicate, composed of officers of the company mainly who were occupying positions of trust, who if they had been honest ought to have represented the stockholders, who were all drawing salaries for their positions, and some of them large salaries—this syndicate went into some land business. The commission gave it in detail here, and they say:

> The land deals, the cash bonuses, and the syndicate's exploitations resulted in a profit to the syndicate of $892,487.21.

And they wind up:

> The effect of the entire transaction was that the syndicate secured a profit of $3,011,929.75, which included the profits on land, the cash donations, and the syndicate's operations.

Mr. President, it would be interesting, if I wanted to take the time to go through this report and show in detail how each one of these things was operated. It is sufficient to say that in every instance it was done by men who were occupying positions of trust and who were drawing salaries from the stockholders whom they were robbing.

If the Senator from Nevada hired me and paid me a salary for the purpose, let us say, of buying horses, and I went out and bought a team for $400 and then turned it over to him at $800 I would be called a robber and a thief. I would be arrested and sent to jail. But if other officers, with myself, who were officers of an interstate railroad, holding in trust the finances of thousands and thousands of honest people, knew of some property that that railroad perhaps ought to have and could buy it for a million dollars, and if then, with my other associates also drawing a salary, we would buy it for a million dollars and turn it over to our employer for $2,000,000, I would be doing just exactly what time and time again has been done by the financial pirates who have made fortunes for themselves by practically stealing it, not from an ordinary person but from some persons for whom they were occupying positions of honor and trust and were paid immense salaries.

Mr. President, the committee does not need to investigate. They can have access to this evidence. They can get it. The President probably knew something about it when he delivered that first message, when fresh from his victory he was anxious to carry out the pledge he made to the people and asked us to enact a law. He knew it then. He has forgotten it now.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I do not want to interrupt the continuity of the Senator's argument, but sometime before he takes his seat I suggest this question: Does not the proposition as presented by the appointment of this committee raise a different question, and that is the question whether or not regulation and control is not of itself breaking down, whether or not that is the proper system and method to deal with the transportation question? In other words, does not the President—perhaps I should not refer to the President, because I do not know just what his views are on this question, but do not those who seek now, after 20 years of experience in reference to regulation and control, to reenter upon the question of investigation admit by that proposition that they are really investigating the question whether regulation and control is the proper method by which to deal with the railroad question?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I might just as well answer that now as at any time. As I said at the beginning, I would have no objection to this investigation being made if I was sure that it was not going to be used as an argument against any legislation of this kind in the future. The investigation along the lines suggested by the Senator from Idaho would be valuable. It would be a good thing to engage on, but while we are investigating these same things which I have already pointed out, and more that I am going to point out may be going on all over the country, do we want to practically say by our silence that while we believe in punishing the man who robs his neighbor or who steals his purse we are in favor of remaining quiet while men rob millions that have been contributed in pennies, often by widows and orphans? Not only that, but it has the effect of ruining or at least injuring all honestly managed railroads in the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I was led to submit that question to the Senator by reason of the fact that there is much argument being adduced in these days to the effect that the regulation and control of transportation through commissions is a failure. I want to read, with the permission of the Senator, an authority upon this question, so that it may receive his attention before he closes:

> Governmental control, which we are undertaking so extensively and with so light a heart, sets up not a reign of law, but a reign of discretion and individual judgment on the part of governmental officials in the regulation of the business of stock companies owned by innumerable private individuals and supplying the chief investments of thousands of communities. I can see no radical difference in principle between governmental ownership and governmental regulation of this discretionary kind. Regulation by commission is not regulation by law, but control according to the discretion of governmental officials. Regulation by law is judicial, by fixed and definite rule, whereas regulation by commission is an affair of business sense, of the comprehension and thorough understanding of complex and various bodies of business. There is no logical stopping place between that and the actual conduct of business enterprises by the Government.
> Such methods of regulation, it may be safely predicted, will sooner or later be completely discredited by experience. Commissions in the future as in the past will reflect rather public opinion than business discretion. The only safe process, the only American process, the only effective process is the regulation of transactions by the definite prohibitions of law, item by item, as experience discloses their character and their effects, and the punishment of the particular individuals who engage in them.

Mr. President, there is a statement of a defect in the subject of regulation or control by commissions at all, which I apprehend is one of the things into which this committee is going to inquire. In my judgment we must assume there is a deeper problem than that which appears upon the face of this movement.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator from Idaho did not quote his authority. He said it was distinguished authority. I should like to have it quoted.

Mr. BORAH. I have been criticized here so much for being familiar with the President's writings, I thought I might permit it to stand upon its own merit. That is a statement from the President made some several years ago.

Mr. NORRIS. I think we all understood it was from the President.

Mr. BORAH. But I presented it here for the reason that it seems this committee has no occasion to go into the investigation of facts as to what law we should have if we are going to continue to regulate and control public corporations through commissions. We have sufficient facts, as the Senator is demonstrating, beyond question, to legislate now.

Mr. NORRIS. That is my idea.

Mr. BORAH. It must be, Mr. President, that this committee proposes to go into the deeper and profounder question whether or not regulation and control is the proper method to deal with transportation.

Mr. NORRIS. I would be glad to have them investigate that; I would be glad to get any information we can; but as to whether we ought to have some legislation now, I do not believe there can be any doubt.

The Interstate Commerce Commission investigated the New Haven road. They have two reports on the New Haven road and they are both exceedingly interesting.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not giving the Senator my attention during the first part of his speech, and I wanted to inquire of him whether at any stage of his speech he has indicated what additional legislation he thinks we ought to have?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not, but I am going to do so before I get through.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator had not so indicated at some other point in his speech I was going to ask him, before he finishes his remarks, if he would do so.

Mr. NORRIS. I intend to do that before I get through, and if I should forget to do it, I would be glad to have the Senator from North Carolina or some one else call my attention to the fact that I have forgotten it.

When I was interrupted I was about to make some comments and read some facts from the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission on the New Haven road, and again the trouble is all financial. In other words, like the commission said in regard to the Frisco system, the trouble is with its financial operation. It is because the men who control the finances of the railroads have not been fair but in many cases have been downright dishonest that we have many of the receivers and much of the congestion and much of the difficulty that now stares the country in the face in the interstate transportation problem. The Interstate Commerce Commission say:

> June 30, 1903, the total capitalization of the New Haven Co. was approximately $93,000,000, of which $79,000,000 was stock and $14,000,000 bonds. The mileage then operated was 2,040 miles. On June 30, 1912, the capitalization, excluding stock premiums, was $417,000,000, an increase of $324,000,000, while the operated mileage was 2,090, an increase of 50 miles.

So they go on somewhat in detail and analyze their statement and wind up with this language:

> This would leave the sum of $204,000,000 which in nine years had been expended in operations outside its railroad sphere. This fact of itself is a most significant one, which, standing alone, might well require explanation. Attention is here directed to some of the purposes for which and the manner in which this vast sum has been invested.

Then they start out and show the various investments that were made. They organized, like the men in managing the Frisco did, various subsidiary corporations, bought and sold subsidiary railroad stocks and bonds, steamship lines, navigation companies, steamboats, and other things. In speaking of the New York, Westchester & Boston Railway as one of the subsidiary companies where they spent a lot of this money, the commission said:

> Here, therefore, is an enterprise which has cost the New Haven Co. $12,000,000 in excess of the value of its property upon its own showing. Again the question arises, What has become of this $12,000,000? In case of the Rhode Island Co. it was possible to locate the corporation, if not the individual, which had ostensibly obtained the money, but in this case it is impossible from anything upon the books of the New Haven Co. to do this even approximately. So far as those records go this money has vanished into thin air.

The New Haven Co., or those who controlled its finances, had a great deal to do with the company organized by Mr. Billard, and after going over that at some length they say:

> It may be that the true inwardness of this transaction is not yet understood; but the accounting officers of the New Haven Co. have been heard in testimony, the president of that company has been heard in explanation, and upon this record as it stands the New Haven Co. has given away of the funds of that company to Mr. Billard and his associates or to the stockholders of the Billard Co., whatever that may be, between $2,500,000 and $3,000,000 of the property of the New Haven Co.

In another place the commission say:

> The purpose, or at least the effect, of this New Haven bookkeeping is to utterly becloud those operations so as to render any intelligent understanding of them almost impossible. If the thing done is legitimate, why not do it in a direct way? If the purpose be honest, why clothe it in the habiliments of the mountebank? The mere fact that such methods are employed inspires distrust. No man can examine the history of the New Haven Co. for the last nine years without a feeling of doubt and uncertainty. The use of such methods in the management of public utilities should not be tolerated.

In a further investigation, Mr. President, made by the commission of this same railroad, printed July 15, 1914, the commission further commented upon the financial operation of this great system of railways, one of the greatest systems in the world. They use this language:

> The New Haven system has more than 300 subsidiary corporations, in a web of entangling alliances with each other, many of which were seemingly planned, created, and manipulated by lawyers expressly retained for the purpose of concealment or deception. Ordinarily in investigations of this character evidence is easily adduced by placing the witnesses upon the stand, but in this investigation the witnesses other than the accountants for the commission were in the main hostile, and with few exceptions their testimony was unwillingly given.
> The result of our research into the financial workings of the former management of the New Haven system has been to disclose one of the most glaring instances of maladministration revealed in all the history of American railroading.

You do not need to have any committee make an investigation in order to ascertain those facts. A commission, better equipped to investigate than any committee either of the Senate or of the House, have given you not only their conclusions, but all of the facts; they have presented all of the evidence, and it is accessible to every Member of Congress. The commission further say:

> The difficulties under which this railroad system has labored in the past are internal and wholly due to its own mismanagement. Its troubles have not arisen because of regulation by governmental authority. Its greatest losses and most costly blunders were made in attempting to circumvent governmental regulation and to extend its domination beyond the limits fixed by law.
> The subject matter of this inquiry relates to the financial operation of a railroad system which, on June 30, 1903, had a total capitalization of approximately $93,000,000, of which $79,000,000 was stock and $14,000,000 bonds. In the 10 years from June 30, 1903, this capitalization was increased from $93,000,000 to $417,000,000, exclusive of stock premiums, or an increase of $324,000,000. Of this increase approximately $120,000,000 was devoted to its railroad property and was expended for betterments and equipment. This leaves the sum of $204,000,000, which was expended for operations outside of its railroad sphere. Through the expenditure of this sum this railroad system has practically monopolized the freight and passenger business in five of the States of the Union. It has acquired a monopoly of competing steamship lines and trolley systems in the section which it serves. The financial operations necessary for those acquisitions and the losses which they have entailed have been skillfully concealed by the juggling of money and securities from one subsidiary corporation to another.

SIGNIFICANT INCIDENTS.

> Marked features and significant incidents in the loose, extravagant, and improvident administration of the finances of the New Haven as shown in this investigation are the Boston & Maine despoilment; the iniquity of the Westchester acquisition; the double price paid for the Rhode Island trolleys; the recklessness in the purchase of Connecticut and Massachusetts trolleys at prices exorbitantly in excess of their market value; the unwarranted expenditure of large amounts in "educating public opinion"; the disposition, without knowledge of the directors, of hundreds of thousands of dollars for influencing public sentiment; the habitual payment of unitemized vouchers without any clear specification of details; the confusing inter-relation of the principal company and its subsidiaries and consequent complication of accounts; the practice of financial legerdemain in issuing large blocks of New Haven stock for notes of the New England Navigation Co., and manipulating these securities back and forth; fictitious sales of New Haven stock to friendly parties with the design of boosting the stock and unloading on the public at the higher "market price"; the unlawful diversion of corporate funds to political organizations; the scattering of retainers to attorneys of five States, who rendered no itemized bills for services and who conducted no litigation to which the railroad was a party; extensive use of a paid lobby in matters as to which the directors claim to have no information; the attempt to control utterances of the press by subsidizing reporters; payment of money and the profligate issue of free passes to legislators and their friends; the investment of $400,000 in securities of a New England newspaper; the regular employment of political bosses in Rhode Island and other States, not for the purpose of having them perform any service but to prevent them, as Mr. Mellen expressed it, from "becoming active on the other side"; the retention by John L. Billard of more than $2,700,000 in a transaction in which he represented the New Haven and into which he invested not a dollar; the inability of Oakleigh Thorne to account for $1,032,000 of the funds of the New Haven intrusted to him in carrying out the Westchester proposition; the story of Mr. Mellen as to the distribution of $1,200,000 for corrupt purposes in bringing about amendments of the Westchester and Port Chester franchises; the domination of all the affairs of this railroad by Mr. Morgan and Mr. Mellen and the absolute subordination of other members of the board of directors to the will of these two; the unwarranted increase of the New Haven liabilities from $93,000,000 in 1903 to $417,000,000 in 1913; the increase in floating notes from nothing in 1903 to approximately $40,000,000 in 1913; the indefensible standard of business ethics and the absence of financial acumen displayed by eminent financiers in directing the destinies of this railroad in its attempt to establish a monopoly of the transportation of New England. A combination of all these has resulted in the present deplorable situation in which the affairs of this railroad are involved.

THE NEW YORK, WESTCHESTER & BOSTON RAILWAY CO.

They say that is one of the subsidiary companies—

> The Westchester is a story of the profligate waste of corporate funds. The road was not necessary as a part of the New Haven system. It parallels other lines already owned by the New Haven and traverses territory which the New Haven already served. That it was recognized as unnecessary by the New Haven itself at its inception is evidenced by the fact that the New Haven sought an injunction to restrain the construction of this road on the specific ground that it was not in answer to any public necessity and paralleled its already existing line.
> The enormous sum of $36,434,173.25 was expended for a road only 18.03 miles in extent, which is being operated at an annual loss of approximately $1,250,000, and which will have to increase its earnings four and one-half fold before it can pay its operating expenses and fixed charges. It is inconceivable that this enterprise could have been entered into by the New Haven as a result of the mandates of good judgment and proper railroading.

I have been reading mostly the summarizing by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the various enterprises. I want to read some of the details of one of them. As an incident in one of these transactions, where they had spent millions of dollars in getting this short railroad—and it was necessary, I judge, by reading between the lines, to control a lot of politicians—they expended over a million dollars in this operation. The commission said:

In explaining how these negotiations were conducted, Mr. Mellen testified that it was intended that one share of New Haven stock should be exchanged for three shares of Westchester stock.

Just before this he testified that Westchester stock was worth about 10 cents a pound; it was practically worthless; and they were giving one share of New Haven for three shares of worthless stock.

When the New Haven stock was not immediately at hand he issued to the messenger who brought Westchester stock a duebill, which was in terms an order on himself to pay on demand to bearer the specified number of shares of New Haven stock or its equivalent in cash at $150 per share, with accrued dividends. Many of these duebills were not presented until Mr. Mellen's connection with the New Haven was severed, and five of them, aggregating $50,000, approximately, are still outstanding. During the time the duebills were outstanding Mr. Mellen collected the dividends on the New Haven stock which they represented, and at each dividend period unknown messengers would appear in his office at the Grand Central Station, in New York City, and demand these dividends, which Mr. Mellen would then pay with his personal checks, so drawn that the identity of the persons cashing them could not be ascertained.

And thus they spent in this way to unknown persons more than a million dollars.

Witnesses who were officers of some of these companies appeared before the commission and testified that they acted as "dummies" under the directions of Robbins and of attorneys selected by him.

And, by the way, Robbins was an attorney of the New Haven road, getting a salary from that corporation.

Some of them handled, without any knowledge of the nature or purpose of the transactions, checks approximating $3,000,000.

In speaking of the Billard Co., the commission says:

All the assets of the Billard Co. belong to the stockholders of the New Haven Railroad. All the money sunk in its operations belonged to the New Haven Railroad.

A suit should be maintainable by the New Haven against Billard and all who have participated in this fraud upon the stockholders.

I read that opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission right there for the purpose of emphasizing the need of legislation that will permit an action by the ruined corporation, and, if not by the corporation, then by the stockholders, against the persons who have committed the wrong to recover the damages they have sustained.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator know of any existing law under which that can be done?

Mr. NORRIS. I presume there is such a law. I presume under the laws of the States, probably, that kind of an action could be maintained; but the practical difficulty of applying it renders it almost an impossibility, as has been demonstrated in the New Haven case. There were some suits instituted there, but nothing has ever been recovered.

Mr. KENYON. I introduced, some years ago, a bill along that line, which was pretty carefully drawn by those who thought they knew the subject; but it rests in the usual mausoleum for bills of that character.

Mr. NORRIS. But the Senator does not think, therefore, does he, that we ought to spend two or three more years investigating to see whether we ought to have that kind of a law?

Mr. KENYON. I think we have enough evidence on that subject now.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of South Carolina in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator from Iowa——

Mr. NORRIS. I would prefer that the Senator would direct his question to me. I do not want to yield the floor.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then I will ask the Senator from Nebraska to ask the Senator from Iowa whether he pressed the bill to which he referred before the Interstate Commerce Committee. I have no recollection of the consideration of that bill being urged.

Mr. NORRIS. Since the Senator from Nevada has asked that question, I will let the Senator from Iowa answer it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to say to the Senator from Iowa that I always give very great consideration to any urgency upon his part for the consideration of any measure.

Mr. KENYON. I want to answer that in this way: I introduced, I think three or four years ago, a bill to give the Interstate Commerce Commission power to make uniform classifications in freight rates. That bill passed the Senate and went to the House. The railroads then became very active and hearings were had in the House, but the bill did not pass the House and Congress adjourned. I introduced the bill again at the next session of the Senate, and it went to a subcommittee, by whom hearings were held, lasting nearly all summer, but I have never heard what became of the bill. My experience with it was so absolutely discouraging that I have not pressed it as perhaps I should have done, but in view of the argument now being made I shall try to do so. In the meantime I would be glad if the Senator from Nebraska would ask the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee what has become of the bill giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to make uniform classifications?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that I will send over to the committee and ascertain what the status is at present. I can not recall the exact status of that bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I shall have more to say, Mr. President, a little later on, when I get through with these citations, about legislation of the nature of that in regard to which the Senator from Iowa has interrogated the chairman of the committee.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state to the Senator from Nebraska that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is able to furnish the information for which he asks.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I prefer not to be led off on another issue.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator from Nebraska ought to be willing to have the Senate furnished with the information.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I will yield. Go ahead.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. To anybody; to the Senator from Arkansas first.

Mr. ROBINSON. I merely desired to answer the inquiry made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] as to what action had been taken concerning the bill to authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to make a uniform classification of freight rates.

During the last Congress the bill was referred to a subcommittee of which I was chairman, and prolonged hearings were had upon the bill. The subcommittee reached the conclusion that no legislation should be had at that time, for the reason that the classification is now being made by the carriers themselves. The work is progressing with a fair degree of rapidity, and to impose that additional work on the Interstate Commerce Commission, as now organized, would simply overwhelm them with burdens which they could not perform satisfactorily either to themselves or to the public.

So far as I know, no action has been taken concerning the measure since its reintroduction during the present Congress by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. May I inquire of the Senator from Arkansas if any report of that kind was filed with the committee?

Mr. ROBINSON. No, sir. No report was made.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in speaking of "dummy" corporations the Interstate Commerce Commission uses this language:

The frequency with which dummy corporations and dummy directors appear in this record leads to the conclusion that some one high in the counsels of the New Haven had an obsession upon the subject of the utility of such sham methods. The directors of the Billard Co. confessed that they were dummies and knew nothing of its operations. Why men of respectability and standing as these appear to be should lend their names as dummies passes comprehension.

In the organization of one of the steamship companies the young lady stenographer was made president, and a youth of 21 years of age by the name of Grover Cleveland Richards—was selected as treasurer of another company.

I presume it was on account of his name—

Clerks and irresponsible persons were drawn upon to supply the demands for dummies in the financial joy riding by the management of the New Haven.

Thus, throughout the entire story of deception, the New Haven management vainly endeavored to hide the true facts behind these dummy individuals and dummy corporations.

While stock in the New Haven road was listed on the New York Stock Exchange a large portion of its funds were invested in "blue-sky" corporations, the officers of which knew nothing of the purposes or assets of the companies of which they were managers or officers.

The Senator from Illinois referred to one of the officers of the Frisco Road—and, by the way, he was also an officer of the Rock Island—going before a Republican club and making a speech. I want to read what the commission have to say about the politics of this railroad. They say:

The New Haven Railroad had no politics. It was Democratic in Democratic States and Republican in Republican States. As Mr. Mellen testified, its effort was always to "get under the best umbrella."

Then follow several contributions that were made for political purposes. Often in their examination they found that these contributions and expenditures were not traceable directly to political parties and political committees, but from various circumstances, and from the fact that no other explanation could be made, and circumstantial evidence bearing upon the particular transaction, they were of the opinion that they had been used for political purposes, or at least for purposes beyond what they ought to have been used for.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator regard the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission as trustworthy and sufficient?

Mr. NORRIS. I regard the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission as trustworthy. Unless there were some circumstances surrounding the case that would throw some suspicion on it, I consider that it would be just as trustworthy as a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator knows of no such circumstances?

Mr. NORRIS. Not in this case nor in any other case to which I will refer. There have been charges in the railroad rate case that improper influences were used and had some effect, but I am not referring in any way to that case.

In summing up the investments in one of these subsidiary companies the commission say:

From all of the foregoing and from a careful consideration of the method in which expenditures, not specified herein, have been made, it is submitted that a reasonable estimate of the loss to the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. by reason of waste and mismanagement will amount to between $60,000,000 and $90,000,000.

The splendid property of the New Haven Railroad itself will be called upon for many a year to make up the drain upon its resources resulting from the unpardonable folly of the transactions outside the proper field in which stockholders supposed their moneys were invested.

But honesty and efficiency of management of this property as a railroad only will, undoubtedly, in time, restore its former standing.

You will notice here that they say that their losses are between $60,000,000 and $90,000,000. In another place in the opinion they said that the amount of money belonging to the New Haven stockholders improperly used was $204,000,000. Of course in this investment of $204,000,000 outside of railroad business proper there was some saved, resulting, as they say here, only in a net loss of between sixty and ninety million dollars.

Now, I want to read the conclusion that was reached by the commission in this case:

This investigation has demonstrated that the monopoly theory of those controlling the New Haven was unsound and mischievous in its effects. To achieve such monopoly meant the reckless and scandalous expenditure of money; it meant the attempt to control public opinion; corruption of government; the attempt to pervert the political and economic instincts of the people in insolent defiance of law. Through exposure of the methods of this monopoly the invisible government which has gone far in its efforts to dominate New England has been made visible. It has been clearly proven how public opinion was distorted; how officials who were needed and who could be bought were bought; how newspapers that could be subsidized were subsidized; how a college professor and publicists secretly accepted money from the New Haven while masking as a representative of a great American university and as the guardians of the interests of the people; how agencies of information to the public were prostituted wherever they could be prostituted in order to carry out a scheme of private transportation monopoly imperial in its scope.

Most of the directors of the New Haven accepted their responsibilities lightly. They failed to realize that their names gave confidence to the public and that their connection with the corporation led the public to invest. When these directors were negligent and serious losses resulted therefrom they were guilty of a grave dereliction of duty and a breach of trust that was morally wrong and criminal in its fruits.

Here are some of the recommendations they made:

Directors should be made individually liable to civil and criminal laws for the manner in which they discharge their trust. A corporation can be no better or worse than those who operate it. It should be just as grave a crime to plunder stockholders or the public through a railroad corporation as it is to personally rob an individual.

They conclude by saying:

The insuring of honesty throughout the management of the great railroads of the country is a most important question before the people to-day, and only when through exposure of wrongdoing and an awakened public conscience coupled with effective laws this result is produced, may railroading be placed upon the high level that it should occupy. The revelations in this record make it essential for the welfare of the Nation that the reckless and profligate financiering which has blighted this railroad system be ended, and until this is fully done there will be no assurance that the story of the New Haven will not be told again with the stockholders of some other railroad system as the victims.

I submit, Mr. President, that to put that recommendation into law requires no investigation of an extended nature by a joint committee of the House and the Senate.

I wish to conclude what I have to say by reading some extracts from another report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, made in the case of the Rock Island Railroad. In order that we may first get an idea as to just exactly what the Rock Island is, I will read a paragraph from the beginning of the opinion:

In 1902 the main line of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Co. extended from Chicago to Denver, with branch lines to St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Kansas City. The territory served is one of the richest and most prosperous in the country and the system's ramification of branch lines insures to it a large volume of tonnage. It was then thriving and its prospects were promising, its stock selling in the markets of the world at more than $200 a share. In 1914 the shares had fallen to $20 and the road is now in receivers' hands. The evidence shows that the earnings of the railway company have steadily increased, and that in 1914 they were the largest in its history.

And yet it went into the hands of a receiver.

It seems to me that that simple statement tells a story that we ought to heed, Mr. President. In 10 years the stock of this company fell from $200 to $20 a share, and then the company went into the hands of a receiver, as they show in here, altogether and entirely on account of financial mismanagement. The earnings increased every year, and last year, 1914, they were greater than they had ever been in the history of the company.

Much the same method was used here by the officers of the company that was used in the other cases to which I have referred. We find that these men who were getting salaries from this railroad company were continually organizing syndicates for the purpose of buying subsidiary corporations, dealing in various things, using the money of the railroad company to do it with, and always making a profit out of it themselves. I believe there is one instance, at least, where one man became the agent of the other corporation to sell it, so that he got a commission from the other corporation for making the sale and he got a commission from the Rock Island Co. for making the purchase, in addition to which he drew his own salary. Many of the salaries, in my judgment, were much larger than they ought to have been, even though the officers had been faithful to their trust.

The officers of this railroad company, in addition to practicing the methods pursued in others of buying from some other company and selling to the company which they represented, gave direct bonuses to themselves; and the Interstate Commerce Commission gives some illustration about it.

Following are specific instances shown of record of the contributions referred to:

J. E. Gorman, first vice president in charge of freight and passenger traffic, was secretly paid $18,750 per annum, making his total compensation $43,750, whereas the pay roll showed $25,000.

C. A. Morse, chief engineer, received a salary of $15,000 per annum and a secret bonus of $3,000 on the first of each year.

Upon the retirement of R. A. Jackson as general solicitor, he was given $100,000 in cash.

As an inducement to L. F. Loree, chairman of the executive committee, to relinquish, after 10 months' service, a joint contract with the railway company and the Frisco under which he was to receive a salary of $75,000 per annum for a period of five years, and in addition was to be paid a bonus of $500,000 at the expiration of the contract, he was given bonds of the railway company of a par value of $450,000. This was borne equally by the two companies, and the proportion of the railway company was charged to profit and loss. The total amount borne by the railway company in this transaction exceeded $250,000.

C. H. Warren, vice president, was given by the railway company $150,000 in par value of the common and $105,000 in par value of the preferred stock of the New Jersey company and $50,000 in cash. There was no board authorization for the latter expenditure, the item being represented in the records of the railway company merely by a voucher signed by D. G. Reid.

The New Jersey corporation was a subsidiary of the railroad company.

R. R. Cable, a member of the executive committee, received from the railway company $30,000 in bonds of the Iowa company—then worth $24,500, for his services in the acquisition of the Burlington, Cedar Rapids & Northern Railway Co., and he was paid by the latter company $85,000 in the same transaction. Mr. Cable also received another contribution, which will be referred to later.

That was another subsidiary company—

Robert Mather, vice president, was given $25,000 in cash.

George T. Boggs, director and secretary of the board of directors of the railway company, was given $15,000 in cash when he retired from the secretaryship of the railway company.

Then they appropriated several millions of stock of their own company. After they increased the capital stock of the Rock Island to $10,000,000 at one time and several millions at another and used the proceeds for the purposes for which it was issued and had some stock left, they divided it among themselves. So that these men who were occupying positions of trust for this company and drawing large salaries—I have a list of their salaries—were continually robbing the people whom they were expected to represent.

Speaking of some voucher payments, some irregular payments, they say:

Another voucher in favor of the Liberty National Bank of New York City, in exchange for a cashier's check issued to Robert Mather for $25,000, is charged to "general expenses" under "operating expenses." This voucher refers to a miscellaneous file shown by the index thereto to have comprehended "contributions to campaign committee." The file, however, was not produced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 381) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, a small measure that I was interested in was reported this morning when I was out of the Chamber attending a committee meeting.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ascertain if the Senator wishes to take the bill up now?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask my colleague [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] if they will not agree to temporarily lay aside the unfinished business, or if I shall be recognized by the Chair I can proceed with the matter which has been before the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will say that I prefer the Senator shall proceed with his speech, because I promised the Senator from Utah that I would not ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside this morning.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, if I can get recognition, I will proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has the floor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will explain to the Senator from Nebraska that I was not here this morning because I was attending a meeting of a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations which is considering the urgent deficiency appropriation bill. At 2 o'clock the subcommittee meets again and I shall have to return.

Mr. NORRIS. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 76, which has been favorably reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think it will then be necessary for me to ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the purpose stated by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not necessary.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not necessary, as the Senator from Alabama after the regular order was called up obtained the floor and asked unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution. It does not displace the unfinished business.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can not consent to that course because it would displace the unfinished business. I ask that my request be put first.

Mr. SMOOT. No, it would not displace the unfinished business unless it led to discussion and we were discussing the joint resolution at the time we adjourned. Then it would displace the unfinished business.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am aware of that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the request of the Senator from Nebraska to the effect that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent for the specific disposition of the joint resolution in hand. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LOAN OF TENTS AND COTS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 76) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan 1,000 tents and 1,000 cots for the use of the encampment of the United Confederate Veterans to be held at Birmingham, Ala., in May, 1916.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to make a short statement as to the purpose of the joint resolution. It is in the usual form. It has been customary in the past when these encampments were held, either by the Grand Army of the Republic or by Confederate veterans, to loan to them tents and cots. The joint resolution I have now called up is prepared in the same form as other measures that have been passed in years gone by. Accompanying it there is a letter from the Secretary of War stating that the property will be available, and the joint resolution provides that the persons getting the tents for this encampment shall give bond for their safe return to the Government without injury. It is necessary to pass it at this time, so that they may be advised as to whether they can have the use of tents for the purpose of the encampment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Wait just a minute, until I read the letter from the Secretary of War. [After a pause.] I do not object.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator from Nebraska permit me to give a notice that to-morrow, at the expiration of the morning business, I shall call up the pending joint resolution?

Mr. NORRIS. Continuing the reading where I was interrupted, the commission says:

Without this file it is impossible to state the purpose for which the money was expended, but the generalization "contributions to campaign committee," in the light of the practices indulged in by the syndicate in question, is clearly suggestive.

The books of the railway company reveal payments aggregating $44,066.05 to the Denver Post. The vouchers attached read, "for advertising in editorial and news columns." Other entries show that three of these vouchers, aggregating $20,000, cover a refund that this newspaper received at the rate of 25 cents per hundred on its freight carried over the lines of the railway company from points in Wisconsin.

Another voucher is for $50,000 to S. M. Felton, for the railway's proportion of amount "paid by E. H. Harriman and his associates for money expended by them to secure the discontinuance of a line of road being constructed in 1900 between Peoria, Ill., and Clinton, Iowa, as per agreement between R. R. Cable, chairman of the board, and E. H. Harriman."

The commission, in considering an arrangement which this company had then with the St. Louis & San Francisco Railway, wind up their comment by saying:

The final result of this transaction is that the railway company has sustained a loss estimated to be about $6,500,000.

Speaking of another deal they say:

Its net loss from this transaction, including interest, was $906,420, and this, added to its loss in connection with the other coal company above referred to—

This was in regard to the purchase of the stock of another coal company—makes a total loss of more than $1,300,000 as a result of its coal deals. If the advances to the coal companies can not be collected it will result in an additional loss of $2,500,000.

Bear in mind, Mr. President, that when this loss occurred to the railway company the officers of the railroad company composing the syndicate that was in the deal aways made what the railroad company lost.

The aggregate losses sustained by the railway company in connection with the foregoing transactions may be summarized as follows.

And then they itemize it. I will put those in the RECORD, with the permission of the Senate, without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

AGGREGATE OF LOSSES.

The aggregate losses sustained by the railway company in connection with the foregoing transactions may be summarized as follows:

Expenses of maintaining and housing holding companies, more than	$290,000.00
Frisco deal, approximately	6,500,000.00
Alton deal, approximately	6,370,000.00
Trinity & Brazos Valley Railway deal, more than	4,500,000.00
Consolidated Indiana and Dering coal companies, at least	1,300,000.00
Contributions or gratuities to officers and directors, about	1,000,000.00
Venner transaction	217,000.00
Miscellaneous and unexplained expenditures	72,523.45

These items show an aggregate loss to the railway company of more than $20,000,000. In addition thereto, it is to be noted that prior to June 30, 1914, the railway company paid to financial institutions, in connection with the issuance of bonds, commissions aggregating more than $1,600,000, and suffered discounts of more than $17,700,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, they were unable to get all the facts in regard to all these transactions. In one case Mr. Reid, when interrogated with a view to ascertaining his profits from the various transactions, explained that he always burned his books at the end of each month. Mr. Reid was one of the board of directors, and he drew a salary of $32,000 a year.

In speaking of the deal with the Consolidated Indiana Coal Co. they say:

Although R. A. Jackson, vice president and general counsel of the railway company, was receiving a salary of $50,000 a year, he was paid $10,000 by the railway company to draw up the incorporation papers—

Of another company, remember.

The price paid for the coal property owned by the consolidated company was estimated to be substantially more than it was actually worth, and ever since its incorporation it has been operated at a loss. Prior to June 30, 1914, the railway company had made advances to the coal company aggregating $2,354,453.19. The railway company received interest on these loans at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, computed monthly, up to June 30, 1910, when all such interest payments were discontinued. The loss on the part of the railway company attributable to this venture can not be computed exactly, but the loss in interest charges alone since 1910 has amounted to more than $400,000. As the operation of the coal company has for some time been conducted at a loss, there is little prospect of the railway company being reimbursed for the advances made by it.

Now, Mr. President, this railroad company went into the hands of a receiver. This syndicate, organized mainly by men who were officers of the company, put it in the hands of a receiver when it was unnecessary to go there, and they did it because it was to their financial profit to do it. The commission said:

The syndicate decided to put the railway into a receivership—

Now listen to this—

The general counsel of the railway company, at the suggestion of W. H. Moore, a member of the syndicate, drew the bill asking for a receivership, and engaged an attorney, ostensibly to represent the other side. The bill was placed in the hands of this attorney, with the name of the complainant omitted, and he was instructed by the general counsel to locate some creditor of the railway company willing to act as complainant.

Now, here were the officers of a railroad company, drawing large salaries, going around over the country to find a creditor of the company who would make a complaint asking for the appointment of a receiver. They draw the papers and put them in the hands of another attorney and send him out to hunt such a person who was willing to be made plaintiff. Here we find the officers of the company hunting some one to bring suit against them, and when they found him they confessed judgment in the suit they persuaded him to bring. This is high finance with a vengeance. We ought to tell the President that no investigation is necessary to remedy such highway robbery.

But let us read further of the doings of these financial comedians. The commission go on as follows:

There was an agreement between the general counsel and this attorney as to the parties the latter would recommend to the court as receivers, the general counsel agreeing to instruct the attorney appearing for the railway company to acquiesce in the recommendation so made.

The board of directors of the railway company was not informed of the intention to file a bill for receivership, and at no meeting of the board was any authority ever given for such action. Members of the board of directors not in the confidence of the syndicate were kept in ignorance of the fact that such a bill had been prepared. The stockholders had no information of the purpose to put the railway company into a receivership, although a stockholders' meeting was held after the date upon which the receivership bill was completed by the general counsel, and this general counsel attended the meeting. According to the testimony, the bill was completed by the general counsel March 29, 1915, and the fact that it was to be filed whenever desired by those in authority was known only to certain insiders. The testimony clearly establishes the fact that the railway company could easily have paid the debt of $16,000 upon which the receivership application was based, and that arrangements probably could have been made to meet all pressing obligations of the railway company.

The creditor at whose instance the receivership application was filed appeared as complainant by request. R. P. Lamont, the president of the American Steel Foundries, the complainant, testified that he would not have thought of bringing such a proceeding against the railway company unless he had understood that it would be regarded as not unfriendly, but as a friendly act to oblige the railway company. He only consented that his company should appear as complainant when he was assured that this course was in accordance with the wishes of the railway company and that his company was not to have any care or expense in the preparation of papers or payment of counsel fees. The suit was not a bona fide proceeding to collect a debt, but was instituted to carry out the purpose and schemes of the syndicate controlling the railway.

It is a forceful commentary on the methods by which a great railway may be manipulated into a receivership when it is noted that the general counsel, after drawing the bill for a receivership, sold his stock, and the local counsel, who represented the railway company in the receivership proceedings, owned no stock in the railway company, and that none of those directly participating in the receivership proceedings had any financial interest in the railway company. The real owners of the railway, the stockholders, the security holders, and the directors, except those composing the syndicate and in its confidence, were in ignorance of the receivership application.

The property of the railway company will be called upon for many years to make up the drain upon its resources resulting from transactions outside the proper sphere in which stockholders had a right to suppose their moneys were invested. This record emphasizes the need of railway directors who actually direct. There are too many passive directors who acquiesce in what is being done without knowledge and without investigation. A director of a railroad is a quasi public official who occupies a position of trust. A director who submits blindly to the exploitation of his company is a party to its undoing, and he should be held responsible to the same extent as if he had been a principal instead of an accessory before the fact. The greater his prominence the greater his responsibility and the greater his dereliction. Obviously a man of large affairs could not attend to all the details in intricate transactions, but it is inconceivable that a director of ordinary business prudence and sagacity would sanction large expenditures without an inquiry as to the purposes of such disbursements. So long as this situation exists, however, it suggests the need of a law to charge such directors with individual responsibility for the dissipation of corporate funds.

There is a recommendation to the committee of the need of a law to charge the directors with individual responsibility for the dissipation of corporate funds. Now, they conclude:

The Clayton Antitrust Act—

Says the commission—

which becomes effective October 15, 1915, will make it unlawful for any person at the same time to be a director in two or more competing corporations, any one of which has a capital, surplus, or undivided profits aggregating more than $1,000,000, but common carriers are expressly exempted from its application. It should be just as grave an offense for an official of a railway to be faithless to his trust for financial gain as it is for an elected official of the Government to betray his trust for money reward.

By this case the need of some limitations—

on the issuance of stocks and bonds by common carriers, whether directly or through holding-company devices or otherwise, is again demonstrated.

Mr. President, in this case the men who were occupying positions of trust, employees of the corporation, after they had run the value of the stock of the Rock Island road in 10 years from $200 down to $20, not satisfied with that, formed a syndicate composed of themselves and some financial men outside the railroad company with the deliberate purpose of putting the railroad company in the hands of a receiver. Their own attorney, drawing a salary paid by the stockholders, drew at their direction the bill to file in the court asking that a receiver be appointed.

Then he went out and hunted a man who was a creditor and brought him back as the complainant in the case. This was unknown to the balance of the directors. It was unknown to the stockholders, although that general attorney, drawing a salary, as I said, was present at a stockholders' meeting with that bill in his pocket. Secretly they combined to do this and to hold off until they manipulated the stock that they owned, as the report said, and made money out of it, and then filed the bill, and made no objection, of course, on the part of the railroad company, although the commission says it was a fictitious suit, and consented to the appointment of a receiver, and had an arrangement in advance that some of the very conspirators who were in it, not satisfied with the ill-gotten gains they had made so far, should be appointed receivers.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. What was the name of that attorney?

Mr. NORRIS. He was at the time the general counsel of the railroad company. I do not see his name here. I do not believe I have the name of the general attorney.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I think the Senator does an injustice to one very good man. The receivers appointed for the Rock Island were not both of them conspirators.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not think they were.

Mr. KENYON. I understand it was arranged that the conspirators should be appointed, but the court rather shocked the financial looters by appointing Judge Dickinson as one of the receivers. The other receiver since that time has retired and is defendant in a suit brought against himself and several others by Judge Dickinson, as receiver, for a great many million dollars.

Mr. NORRIS. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Iowa. I perhaps would have forgotten to mention that; I, of course, do not want to do any injustice to Judge Dickinson. My judgment is that he is perfectly competent and perfectly honest, and he is doing very good work as receiver.

Mr. KENYON. I know that Judge Dickinson opposed it just as much as the Senator would have done.

Mr. NORRIS. I submit that the conspirators never had Judge Dickinson in mind. They had their own men alone in mind, and they instructed the other attorney they employed to represent the other side to consent. But it is true, as the Senator from Iowa says—and I am very glad that he has said it—the court refused to carry out the disreputable scheme, and appointed Judge Dickinson as one of the receivers.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator is familiar, is he not, with this suit that Judge Dickinson as a receiver has brought against these eminent men?

Mr. NORRIS. I knew the suit was pending, and I think it is still pending.

Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who was honoring me with his presence but has gotten weary and retired, asked me if I was going to suggest any remedy.

Mr. President, I wish to suggest a remedy. The Interstate Commerce Commission has suggested it in various opinions I have read, but in the syllabus of one of the cases they substantially specify what they think ought to be done. I want to read that:

In the opinion of the commission the following propositions lie at the foundation of all adequate regulation of interstate railroads: (a) Every interstate railroad should be prohibited from expending money or incurring liability or acquiring property not in the operation of its railroad or in the legitimate improvement, extension, or development of that railroad; (b) no interstate railroad should be permitted to lease or purchase any other railroad, nor to acquire the stocks or securities of any other railroad, nor to guarantee the same, directly or indirectly, without the approval of the Federal Government; (c) no stocks or bonds should be issued by an interstate railroad except for the purposes sanctioned in the two preceding paragraphs, and none should be issued without the approval of the Federal Government.

Mr. President, there has been a bill of mine pending before the Interstate Commerce Committee since January 9, 1914, that I think specifically meets the suggestion made not only by the Interstate Commerce Commission, but that would commend itself to any man who would read the evidence and the reports of the investigation made by the Interstate Commerce Commission in the various railroads to which I have alluded. We ought to have a law, and we can have it. We ought to have it, it seems to me, without any further investigation than is necessary to put the bill itself in proper shape so as to do the things that they have marked out. In addition I think it ought specifically to provide that the corporation injured shall have an action against the persons who do the injury, and that if the corporation itself refuses to take the necessary steps, any stockholder can take such steps, and in such a case he ought to be allowed to recover as part of the judgment attorney fees.

The same bill has been introduced in this Congress. It is S. 3669. It provides—

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier, subject to the provisions of this act, to purchase, either directly or indirectly, the stock or the corporate property of any other corporation without having first obtained the consent in writing of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission shall not grant such consent until after investigation and examination it is satisfied that the ownership of such stock or corporate property is not intended as a device or subterfuge, and that the same is fairly necessary for the purpose of carrying out the proper and legitimate objects and duties of such common carrier.

Any officer—

Now we come to the penalty. It seems to me that that is important, and in this bill there is in every instance a criminal penalty—

Any officer, member of the board of directors, or other official or employee of such common carrier who shall use any of its funds, or vote in favor of the use of such funds, to acquire the stock or other property of such subsidiary corporation without the consent in writing as aforesaid of the Interstate Commerce Commission having been duly given, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000 and be imprisoned in the penitentiary for a term of not less than six months nor more than two years.

Will any honest director object to that? Can there be any possibility of injuring any such man if that were placed on the statute books? If that had been on the statute books, do you suppose these things would have happened? It would have been impossible, particularly if one of the other sections were placed there, to conceive that men, in the face of that kind of law, would have violated it.

I believe, Mr. President, if this had been on the statute books the story of the New Haven and Frisco and Rock Island would not have been necessary. They would have been doing now what they were doing when the conspirators undertook to ruin them, a legitimate, profitable, and honest business.

Here is another section:

SEC. 20b. That the board of directors of every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall keep correct and accurate minutes of all the proceedings of said board. Such minutes shall clearly show, without any equivocation or concealment, the expenditures of all moneys authorized to be expended, a correct description of all properties purchased, all contracts entered into, and all other business transacted by said board. Such minutes shall at all times be open to the inspection of any stockholder and to the inspection of the Interstate Commerce Commission and its duly authorized agents. In the discretion of the Interstate Commerce Commission such minutes or any part of the same may be made public.

Then follows a penalty for the violation of that provision.

Mr. President, if those two sections had been on the statute books the sad tales that are only illustrative of the possibilities which may exist under our laws as they stand now could not have been told.

Would such provisions injure an honest man? Can any honest director say that by any possibility he could have been injured if he was doing his duty honestly, if this had been the law?

There are two other sections in this bill, Mr. President, meeting the other conditions which the Interstate Commerce Commission has shown ought to be remedied. I ask, without reading it, that the entire bill may be printed as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The bill referred to is as follows:

A bill (S. 3669) to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended, to provide for certain penalties, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 20 of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, be further amended by adding to said section 20, sections 20a, 20b, 20c, and 20d, as follows:

"SEC. 20a. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier, subject to the provisions of this act, to purchase, either directly or indirectly, the stock or the corporate property of any other corporation without having first obtained the consent in writing of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Inerstate Commerce Commission shall not grant such consent until after investigation and examination it is satisfied that the ownership of such stock or corporate property is not intended as a device or subterfuge, and that the same is fairly necessary for the purpose of carrying out the proper and legitimate objects and duties of such common carrier.

"Any officer, member of the board of directors, or other official or employee of such common carrier who shall use any of its funds, or vote in favor of the use of such funds, to acquire the stock or other property of such subsidiary corporation without the consent in writing as aforesaid of the Interstate Commerce Commission having been duly given, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000 and be imprisoned in the penitentiary for a term of not less than six months nor more than two years.

"SEC. 20b. That the board of directors of every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall keep correct and accurate minutes of all the proceedings of said board. Such minutes shall clearly show, without any equivocation or concealment, the expenditures of all moneys authorized to be expended, a correct description of all properties purchased, all contracts entered into, and all other business transacted by said board. Such minutes shall at all times be open to the inspection of any stockholder and to the inspection of the Interstate Commerce Commission and its duly authorized agents. In the discretion of the Interstate Commerce Commission such minutes or any part of the same may be made public.

"Any officer of such common carrier, or member of the board of directors thereof, or secretary or other officer of said board, who shall conceal any item of expenditure of money, or purchase of any property, or make any false notation or entry in the books or records of such common carrier for the purpose of such concealment, or who shall assist in making any attempt to conceal the same so that the expenditure of said money or the purchase of said property shall not be fairly and honestly shown by the records of such common carrier, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $5,000, and shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary for a term of not less than 1 year nor more than 10 years.

"Any officer or member of the board of directors of such common carrier, or any person acting as fiscal or financial agent of the same, who shall, either directly or indirectly, instruct, advise, or request any official or employee of said common carrier to make any false or misleading record or entry upon the books or records of said common carrier, with the purpose of concealing or covering up any expenditure of any money or the acquisition of any property or of the perpetrating of any other deception in connection with the business of such common carrier, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $10,000, and be imprisoned in the penitentiary for a term of not less than 3 years nor more than 12 years.

"SEC. 20c. That any officer, member of the board of directors, attorney, agent, or other employee of any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act who shall, either directly or indirectly, pay any money, or give any ticket or pass, or other property of such common carrier to any public official of the United States, or of any State, county, municipality, or district, for the purpose of influencing or controlling such official in the performance of any official act, or who shall use any of such funds or property of such common carrier for the purpose of wrongfully and fraudulently influencing or controlling any National, State, county, or municipal board or commission, or other public official in the granting, changing, or withholding of any privilege, right, claim, franchise, or right of way, or who shall use any of the money, tickets, passes, or other property of such common carrier for the purpose of influencing or controlling any political committee, convention, primary, or election, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $10,000 and shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary for a term of not less than 1 year nor more than 15 years.

"SEC. 20d. That any person guilty of any of the offenses charged in section 20a, section 20b, or section 20c shall be personally liable to said common carrier and to the stockholders thereof for any loss or damage resulting from such illegal act, and the stockholders of said common carrier, either singly or collectively, are hereby authorized to maintain an action in any court having jurisdiction for the recovery of such loss or damage. If, after being requested so to do by any stockholder, the officials of such common carrier refuse or neglect to begin such action, and the same is commenced by a stockholder or stockholders and judgment is rendered in his or their favor, the expense of such litigation, together with fair and reasonable attorney fees, shall be a lawful claim against such common carrier, and can be recovered in any court having jurisdiction."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in conclusion let me ask, Is any investigation necessary by a joint committee to gather additional evidence? Is it not up to us to remedy the situation? How can men longer delay when time after time the instrumentalities of government which we have provided by law have called our attention and the attention of the world to these financial conditions that can be so easily remedied by the enactment of a simple statute? Does any man doubt that they ought to be remedied? Is there any man who wants to stand up here or elsewhere and say that the story that can be told of these railroads, as the Interstate Commerce Commission intimates, may be told any day with regard to another railroad? It seems to me, in the face of platform pledges made by our Democratic friends, in the face of the official recommendation of the President that we should meet this proposition, that we ought to pay no attention to the other recommendation of the Chief Executive, wherein he turns his back upon the course that he had so bravely started out to follow, and asks us to be silent.

Mr. President, I fear, if this resolution is enacted, that from now on we shall always be met, when we undertake to remedy this situation, with the proposition that this is a subject under investigation by a joint committee and that, therefore, we shall do nothing.

It seems to me that the time to act is now; that before this Congress adjourns we ought to enact some law that would remedy this situation, though there are those who say that we have legislated too much in reference to the railroads and other corporations and do not need any further legislation. If it was harassing, that objection might be good; but this is not adding any difficulty to regulation. It is simply compelling men who occupy positions of trust to be honest; that is all. No man ought to object to that, unless he wants to indulge in such financial operations as have brought ruin to many of these stockholders.

It is not only stockholders, as everybody knows, who are ruined and injured, but, of course, the general public in the end are also injured; other investors are injured; honest railroad men are injured; honest men who want to make honest investments in railroad stocks and bonds are injured, because under the present conditions they do not want to go into a gambling institution and run the risk of losing their savings.

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 381) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, it seems to me that anything I may say in support of the bill now before the Senate, together with the amendment proposed by the learned Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], would be a twice-told tale vexing the dull ears of a drowsy Senate. I have been very much interested and entertained by the multiplicity of plans and the variety of programs for the settlement of this great problem. The point from which the question is viewed by different Senators and the widely varying shades of thought and conclusions presents rather an interesting psychological phenomenon.

I am reminded of a plan proposed by a black-faced comedian whom I heard some weeks ago. Borrowing from Mr. Dooley, he said that when Dewey sank the Spanish fleet in Manila Bay, he did not know whether the Philippines were canned goods or islands, but now he said he knows they are islands; he knows they are an issue, and he knows they are "a durned nuisance." He said, however, that he was not in favor of selling them to Japan or of giving them to Russia or to China, but he believed in home consumption and home production, and he was going to the next Democratic convention and propose a plank for the platform which would provide that we should swap these islands to England for Ireland and raise our own policemen. [Laughter.] That seems to me just about as reasonable and in accord with the eternal fitness of things as some of the other plans which have been proposed for the settlement of this problem.

Mr. President, it is rather unfortunate that every question considered by the Senate these days must bear the burden or take the coloring of the Senatorial mind upon what is called "Preparedness"—a term which I fear will stand out in American history as a colossal marker of the turning point in the life of this Nation. Well, I rather think the Philippine question has something to do with "preparedness." There is no doubt in my mind, while I have no fear whatever, and do not think any nation beneath the stars is thinking about or has ever seriously thought about attacking the United States through the Philippine Islands—still as a matter of fact if such an attack is contemplated by any nation, or if an attack should be made at any time in the future by a foreign power, there is no question but that the Philippine Islands would be the Achillean heel at which they would first shoot. It is the most vulnerable point in all of the American possessions. The remoteness from our shores and the heterogeneity of the population all contribute to the vulnerableness of the situation. I do not think, however, that we ought to be moved in the settlement of this problem by apprehension of remote contingencies or difficulties which may arise in the future, all of which seem to be magnified by the distorted visions of statesmen who are apparently suffering from the effects of abnormal environment.

I repeat emphatically, that I do not believe there is a nation on earth that ever thought seriously of taking the Philippine Islands from the United States, and I am very sure there is not a nation on earth that could take the Philippine Islands from the United States and hold them against our wishes. As was very eloquently and ably stated by the learned Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], on yesterday, the affluence of whose eloquence and strength of argument always appeals compellingly to me, these questions should be settled upon their own merits—they must be solved, if at all, as they would be in normal times, and the legislative mind should not be moved by the hobgoblins and ghosts that appear in the shadows caused by the crimson torch of war, or the specters in the brains of those who are suffering from the effect of this wave of war lust which is sweeping over the country and temporarily dethroning the reasons of men throughout the world. Let the deliberate judgment of the American statesmen, unmoved by fear, unclouded by the greed for gain, undisturbed by the lust for power, or the pride of empire, assume the reins of government and settle these questions for the future as well as for the immediate present. We should not forget that to-day, well lived, will have a far-reaching effect upon the affairs of to-morrow.

Mr. President, I have endeavored to think profoundly, and I do feel deeply, on this question of "preparedness." There are fundamental objections to it which the superficial observer, I fear, may overlook. Beneath the gilded crest are concealed pernicious policies which will override, indeed absolutely destroy, the vital principles of Democracy, and, unless we shall be careful, overthrow our free institutions. I am one of those who believe that to do the biddings of predatory interests, the goal of whose every effort is big profits, or to follow the lead of the military experts whose natural leanings are for a greater Navy and bigger Army, whose tastes naturally lead them rather to prefer absolute to free government—I say for this administration to follow the lead of such influences will be a mistake, the disastrous consequences of which posterity shall be unable to correct. To express my opposition to "preparedness," as that term is now understood, with its train of inevitable evils, I find it rather difficult to command language. The poverty of my own vocabulary causes me to reach out for help. That my feelings may be vocalized and my thoughts uttered I am going to adopt the language of another whose genius for expression is world renowned, as the better expression of my own views. That which I shall quote from him came as the limpid water from the spring of pure Democracy, unclouded by the mud of politics and untainted with the poison of personal interests. The craving for reelection—the lure of place—the pride of power—and the flattery of pampered interests had not fastened their clammy clutches upon his heart and fired his ambition. The arguments he made then are unanswerable, because he stated the truth, unalloyed by selfish interest. Speaking on the question of "preparedness," the necessity for quadrupling our Army and doubling our Navy, thus outraging the genius of our Government, violating the history and traditions of the Democratic Party, and as the legitimate consequence of illegitimate conditions, piling up higher, and higher still, the burden of taxation upon the backs of the toiling millions of this country, that distinguished citizen said:

"It can not be discussed without first answering some very searching questions. It is said in some quarters that we are not prepared for war. What is meant by being prepared? Is it meant that we are not ready upon brief notice to put a nation in the field, a nation of men trained to arms? Of course we are not ready to do that; and we never shall be in time of peace so long as we retain our present political principles and institutions. And what is it that it is suggested we should be prepared to do? To defend ourselves against attack? We have always found means to do that and shall find them whenever it is necessary without calling our people away from their necessary tasks to render compulsory military service in time of peace.

"Allow me to speak with great plainness and directness upon this great matter and to avow my convictions with deep earnestness. I have tried to know what America is, what her people think, what they are, what they most cherish and hold dear. I hope that some of their finer passions are in my own heart—some of the great conceptions and desires which gave birth to this Government and which have made the voice of this people a voice of peace and hope and liberty among the peoples of the world; and that, speaking my own thoughts, I shall, at least in part, speak theirs also, however faintly and inadequately, upon this vital matter.

"We are at peace with all the world. No one who speaks counsel based on fact or drawn from a just and candid interpretation of realities can say that there is reason to fear that from any quarter our independence or the integrity of our territory is threatened. Dread of the power of any other nation we are incapable of. We are not jealous of rivalry in the fields of commerce or of any other peaceful achievement. We mean to live our own lives as we will; but we mean also to let live. We are, indeed, a true friend to all the nations of the world, because we threaten none, covet the possessions of none, desire the overthrow of none. Our friendship can be accepted and is accepted without reservation, because it is offered in a spirit and for a purpose which no one need ever question or suspect. Therein lies our greatness. We are the champions of peace and of concord. And we should be very jealous of this distinction which we have sought to earn. Just now we should be particularly jealous of it, because it is our dearest present hope that this character and reputation may presently, in God's providence, bring us an opportunity such as has seldom been vouchsafed any nation, the opportunity to counsel and obtain peace in the world and reconciliation and a healing settlement of many a matter that has cooled and interrupted the friendship of nations. This is the time above all others when we should wish and resolve to keep our strength by self-possession, our influence by preserving our ancient principles of action.

"From the first we have had a clear and settled policy with regard to military establishments. We never have had, and while we retain our present principles and ideals we never shall have, a large standing army. If asked, Are you ready to defend yourselves? we reply, Most assuredly, to the utmost; and yet we shall not turn America into a military camp. We will not ask our young men to spend the best years of their lives making soldiers of themselves. There is another sort of energy in us. It will know how to declare itself and make itself effective should occasion arise. And especially when half the world is on fire we shall be careful to make our moral insurance against the spread of the conflagration very definite and certain and adequate indeed.

"Let us remind ourselves, therefore, of the only thing we can do or will do. We must depend in every time of national peril, in the future as in the past, not upon a standing army, nor yet upon a reserve army, but upon a citizenry trained and accustomed to arms. It will be right enough, right American policy, based upon our accustomed principles and practices, to provide a system by which every citizen who will volunteer for the training may be made familiar with the use of modern arms, the rudiments of drill and maneuver, and the maintenance and sanitation of camps. We should encourage such training and make it a means of discipline which our young men will learn to value. It is right that we should provide it not only, but that we should make it as attractive as possible, and so induce our young men to undergo it at such times as they can command a little freedom and can seek the physical development they need, for mere health's sake, if for nothing else. Every means by which such things can be stimulated is legitimate, and such a method smacks of true American ideas. It is right, too, that the National Guard of the States should be developed and strengthened by every means which is not inconsistent with our obligations to our own people or with the established policy of our Government. And this, also, not because the time or occasion specially calls for such measures, but because it should be our constant policy to make these provisions for our national peace and safety.

"More than this carries with it a reversal of the whole history and character of our polity. More than this, proposed at this time, permit me to say, would mean merely that we had lost our self-possession, that we had been thrown off our balance by a war with which we have nothing to do, whose causes can not touch us, whose very existence affords us opportunities of friendship and disinterested service which should make us ashamed of any thought of hostility or fearful preparation for trouble. This is assuredly the opportunity for which a people and a Government like ours were raised up, the opportunity not only to speak but actually to embody and exemplify the counsels of peace and amity and the lasting concord which is based on justice and fair and generous dealing.

"A powerful Navy we have always regarded as our proper and natural means of defense; and it has always been of defense that we have thought, never of aggression or of conquest. But who shall tell us what sort of Navy to build? We shall take leave to be strong upon the seas, in the future as in the past; and there will be no thought of offense or of provocation in that. Our ships are our natural bulwarks. When will the experts tell us just what kind we should construct, and when will they be right for 10 years together, if the relative efficiency of craft of different kinds and uses continues to change as we have seen it change under our very eyes in these last few months?

"But I turn away from the subject. It is not new. There is no new need to discuss it. We shall not alter our attitude toward it because some amongst us are nervous and excited. We shall easily and sensibly agree upon a policy of defense. The question has not changed its aspects because the times are not normal. Our policy will not be for an occasion. It will be conceived as a permanent and settled thing, which we will pursue at all seasons, without haste and after a fashion perfectly consistent with the peace of the world, the abiding friendship of states, and the unhampered freedom of all with whom we deal. Let there be no misconception. The country has been misinformed. We have not been negligent of national defense. We are not unmindful of the great responsibility resting upon us. We shall learn and profit by the lesson of every experience and every new circumstance; and what is needed will be adequately done."

Mr. President, I wish merely to add to this quotation, that of all the times in the history of this Republic when our duty to the world demands that this Government shall talk peace, and act peace, and pray peace, and counsel peace, now is the time above all others to do it. If, after this conflagration which is sweeping over Europe, making of that fair land a veritable Golgotha, shall have ceased its ravages, the good offices which we ought to propose as a government to lead the war-mad nations of the earth back into the paths of peace shall be rejected or spurned, we shall have sufficient time then to talk about converting the American Republic into an armed camp. If the arbitrament of the sword must be the supreme law governing the world, the United States Government will be in a position to raise and equip larger armies, build bigger navies, and otherwise prepare ourselves for the great conflict of the future than any other country on the globe. But I am opposed to making this radical departure until we shall have exhausted every honorable and proper effort to lift the nations of the world out of the bogs and mire of brute force and place them upon the high plane of Christian civilization. It strikes me that to entertain any other view and pursue any other course brands our pretended faith in the Prince of Peace as a bloody lie; and our boasted civilization savagery thinly veneered. The extraordinary efforts of the President and other prominent advocates of militarism to force through Congress without proper consideration the "preparedness" bills can be accounted for only upon the theory that they realize, in order to bring about this radical departure from our time-honored custom, the iron must be welded while the war spirit is at white heat. They realize that the extraordinary character of the scheme can only be accomplished while the public mind is in a fevered state. I regard such efforts as a betrayal of the Democratic Party and a capital crime against posterity.

Mr. President, the bill before the Senate at this time carries with it a recognition of the God-given right of the Filipino to govern himself in his own country as his best judgment may dictate and his interests demand. It also redeems a promise which the American people gave to the Filipino when our Army planted the American flag upon that foreign land as an emblem of American authority without extending to its people the protective ægis of the Constitution. Whatever others may think, say, or do, I still believe that nations ought to respect their moral obligations, political parties fulfill their platform promises, sacredly as the private citizen demands that his neighbor shall observe and absolve his voluntarily assumed obligations. I have no more respect for the integrity of a political party, or the leaders of political parties who violate their platform promises, than I have for the integrity of the man who obtains goods under false pretenses, or the fidelity to the law of the highwayman who relieves the innocent wayfarer of his money at the point of a pistol. There can be no two distinct codes of morals for the individual and the Nation. It was thought after the sovereignty of Spain had ceased in the Philippine Islands by force of American arms that it was the duty of the American Government to aid the Filipinos in the establishment of a government of their own. No patriotic citizen of this Republic at that time imagined that the tyranny of Spain was to be succeeded by American usurpation—our work was altruistic, and the good of the Filipino was the end devoutly sought. We were to assist these people, untrained in the art of self-government, to bring order out of chaos, to establish a government for them, to render just such aid as might be necessary until they should become accustomed to the uses of sovereignty, and after that to retire from the islands, wishing them Godspeed. As an evidence that that was the purpose of the American people, especially those who maintain allegiance to the Democratic Party—the party now in power and commissioned by the American people to direct the affairs of their Government—I am going to ask permission to insert just here as a part of my remarks the planks in the platform of the years 1900 and 1904, 1908 and 1912.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMPSON in the chair). Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE PHILIPPINES.

We condemn and denounce the Philippine policy of the present administration. It has involved the Republic in unnecessary war, sacrificed the lives of many of our noblest sons, and placed the United States, previously known and applauded throughout the world as the champion of freedom, in the false and un-American position of crushing with military force the efforts of our former allies to achieve liberty and self-government. The Filipinos can not be citizens without endangering our civilization; they can not be subjects without imperiling our form of government; and as we are not willing to surrender our civilization nor to convert the Republic into an empire we favor an immediate declaration of the Nation's purpose to give the Filipinos, first, a stable form of government; second, independence; and, third, protection from outside interference, such as has been given for nearly a century to the Republics of Central and South America.

The greedy commercialism which dictated the Philippine policy of the Republican administration attempts to justify it with the plea that it will pay; but even this sordid and unworthy plea fails when brought to the test of facts. The war of criminal aggression against the Filipinos, entailing an annual expense of many millions, has already cost more than any possible profit that could accrue from the entire Philippine trade for years to come. Furthermore, when trade is extended at the expense of liberty, the price is always too high. (Platform, 1900.)

IMPERIALISM.

We favor the preservation, so far as we can, of an open door for the world's commerce in the Orient, without an unnecessary entanglement in Oriental and European affairs, and without arbitrary, unlimited, irresponsible, and absolute government anywhere within our jurisdiction.

We oppose, as fervently as did George Washington himself, an indefinite, irresponsible, discretionary, and vague absolutism and a policy of colonial exploitation, no matter where or by whom invoked or exercised. We believe, with Thomas Jefferson and John Adams, that no government has a right to make one set of laws for those "at home" and another and a different set of laws, absolute in their character, for those "in the colonies." All men under the American flag are entitled to the protection of the institutions whose emblem the flag is. If they are inherently unfit for those institutions, then they are inherently unfit to be members of the American body politic. Wherever there may exist a people incapable of being governed under American laws, in consonance with the American Constitution, the territory of that people ought not to be part of the American domain.

FILIPINOS AND CUBANS.

We insist that we ought to do for the Filipinos what we have done already for the Cubans, and it is our duty to make that promise now and upon suitable guaranties of protection to citizens of our own and other countries resident. (Platform, 1904.)

THE PHILIPPINES.

We condemn the experiment in imperialism as an inexcusable blunder which has involved us in enormous expenses, brought us weakness instead of strength, and laid our Nation open to the charge of abandoning a fundamental doctrine of self-government. We favor an immediate declaration of the Nation's purpose to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands as soon as a stable government can be established, such independence to be guaranteed by us, as we guarantee the independence of Cuba, until the neutralization of the islands can be secured by treaty with other powers. In recognizing the independence of the Philippines our Government should retain such land as may be necessary for coaling stations and naval bases. (Platform, 1908.)

THE PHILIPPINES.

We reaffirm the position thrice announced by the Democracy in national convention assembled against a policy of imperialism and colonial exploitation in the Philippines or elsewhere. We condemn the experiment in imperialism as an inexcusable blunder, which has involved us in enormous expenses, brought us weakness instead of strength, and laid our Nation open to the charge of abandonment of the fundamental doctrine of self-government. We favor an immediate declaration of the Nation's purpose to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands as soon as a stable government can be established, such independence to be guaranteed by us until the neutralization of the islands can be secured by treaty with other powers. In recognizing the independence of the Philippines our Government should retain such land as may be necessary for coaling stations and naval bases. (Platform, 1912.)

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not think anybody thought of our Government remaining in control of the Philippine Islands permanently until the speculator, the financial buccaneer, the commercial bandit caught a vision of what appeared to be opportunities for speculation and the acquisition of wealth. The fertile valleys then occupied by the peaceful natives, the great forests of valuable timber, and the mines buried beneath the mountains in that remote island empire excited the greed and cupidity of the American and stirred to the depths his avaricious spirit—a quality, I am sorry to say, characteristic of the Anglo-Saxon race. At that moment, and not until then, was born the purpose of permanent occupancy, benevolent American control, and the recognition of our God-imposed duty to lead the Filipino to a state of moral and intellectual excellency which could only be attained after generations of American discipline and control.

It is a peculiarity of human nature that whenever a man or a nation desires to do anything of questionable propriety they at once undertake to discover the unseen hand of Infinity leading them on or beckoning them to come. They always try to charge their diabolism to God Almighty. Rivers of blood have been shed, ambitions frustrated, and hopes blighted in the name of liberty or for the glory of God—while in truth it was all done to serve sinister, selfish ends, promote kingly ambition, or gratify royal vanity. I believe that if the personal profits to be derived from our holding the Philippine Islands were eliminated the opposition to this bill would dwindle in a day, and I want to say just in this connection further, Mr. President, that the longer American sovereignty exists in the Philippine Islands, the further you postpone the day of American withdrawal, the greater will be the vested interests by Americans, and therefore the more stubborn the opposition to restoring independence to the Filipino. Now let us consider for a moment what it has cost the American people in blood and treasure to take the Philippine Islands. It is variously estimated in dollars and cents to be somewhere between six hundred million and a billion dollars up to date, and it will cost something like $30,000,000 per annum to retain them in the future. That is the cost in dollars and cents, which is trivial compared to the cost in blood. A thousand American soldiers have been sacrificed in subduing the Filipinos and maintaining American authority there. How many brave boys suffering with tropical diseases have become incurably sick and insane, God alone can tell. The Filipinos have suffered also. In addition to having their rights violated, their homes despoiled, their country invaded, and every sense of right and justice outraged, they have suffered grievously in blood. It is stated by Judge Blount in his work on "American Occupation of the Philippines," page 395:

"In Batangas Province alone from 50,000 to 100,000 people died due to war, pestilence, and famine. According to the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey Atlas of the Philippines, Batangas in 1899 had a population of 312,192. The census of 1903 gives the population as 257,715. This means a casualty of 54,477. On December 15, 1901, the provincial secretary of Batangas reported that the war "had reduced to a little over 200,000 the more than 300,000 inhabitants which in former years the Province had."

Mr. Willis, in a work entitled "Our Philippine Problem," page 23, makes this remarkable statement: "Gen. J. F. Bell estimated in 1902 that one-sixth of the natives in Luzon died as a direct or indirect result of the war. This would put the death roll at at least 600,000 persons."

In the name of justice, Mr. President, if our people were not hardened by the greed for gold and the avarice for empire such a statement would so shock their sensibilities that the refusal of Congress to repair in part even at this late day the damage done, would visit upon the Members of Congress the scorpion lash of their disapproval and utter repudiation. And in the face of this fact which I have not heard disputed we are told that we are "holding these people for their betterment—to uplift them, convert them to the Christian faith, teach them the story of the Prince of Peace." I imagine that a religion of love that must be inoculated or taught by the use of a Krag Jorgeson rifle or a gatling gun as the hypodermic syringe with which to inject it will not be accepted with any degree of joy by the benighted savages of the Orient. Oh, no, Mr. President, this Congress can not be deceived by such duplicity, disingenuousness, and insincerity. There was no altruism in taking the islands against the wishes of the inhabitants thereof. There can be no philanthropy in retaining them longer.

I have never been able to understand the brand of a man's morals who would be in favor of robbing the American taxpayers for the purpose of maintaining sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and use the money taken from the American against his consent and force the Filipino to accept our benefactions against his wishes. But Senators tell us while "we ought not to have gone to the Philippine Islands at all; that, having gone there, we can not with grace or propriety retire." Rather strange logic, is it not? We have committed a mistake and committed it in an effort to render an unselfish service, but we can not rectify or correct the error without being guilty of infidelity to a trust. With all due respect, such contention does not arise to the dignity of second-class nonsense. It does not deceive anybody, either. If we made a mistake when we went to the Philippine Islands and drove out the Spaniards, murdered the Filipinos and usurped the powers of government, the way to correct that mistake is to come away—give back to the Filipinos that which we have withheld from them—leave with them our blessings and sail away to the westward.

Mr. President, if the United States Government had done its duty to the Filipino in the beginning there never would have been a hand raised by the Filipino against American assistance. If we had assured them we were there to assist them in the construction and upbuilding of their own government and the moment we completed that work we were going to retire and leave them to work out their own salvation, assisted by our prayers, precepts, and kindly offices, they would have looked upon us as friends rather than enemies. But they knew we were not there for their betterment, and they know it now. They believed then, and they believed right, that their country was being held in order that certain American citizens might exploit them, rob them of their birthright. And now we are asked, for the good of the Filipino, to add to the crime of plunder the sin of deception. It will not do. There is nothing, however, new or unusual in this entire transaction. History is full of such instances. It is another evidence that human nature does not change. It is the same to-day, yesterday, and forever. But it is contended the Filipino is not capable of self-government. The English historian, Anthony Froude, said: "Popular forms of government are possible only where individual men can govern themselves on moral principles and when duty is of more importance than pleasure and justice than material expediency."

That is the Anglo-Saxon standard. When measured by that standard the Filipino will fall short. But the Filipino must not be measured by the Anglo-Saxon standard for the reason that no other race has ever reached the standard of Anglo-Saxon excellency in the art of self-government. But the Filipino is capable of maintaining a government suitable to his peculiar nature and congenial with his development. Self-government can not be taught. You can not inoculate a man with it as you would administer an anesthetic, nor is it a matter of schoolbook learning. It is rather a capacity born of generations of failures and successes. The evolution of certain truths, wrought by time and trials, that mysterious far-reaching influence of blood, a growing, accumulating, intensifying capacity resulting from generations of practice of the individual until at last it becomes the instinct of the race. No people have ever developed to a high degree the capacity for self-government while they were held as subjects. It is really more a matter of race than education. The illiteracy to-day among the Filipinos, if I have read history right, is not much greater than it was among the Americans when the Constitution of 1787 was adopted, and yet I know it to be a fact that the Filipinos would not be as capable of self-government if every one of them were a college graduate, speaking a half dozen languages, as the Americans were a century and a quarter ago. The fact is I do not believe that the best educated Filipino in the world is as capable of self-government as we practice it in America as the average illiterate sane, sound-minded Anglo-Saxon living in the rural districts of this Republic. Why, Mr. President, the majority of men who extorted the Magna Charta from King John could not read. No, it is not a question of schoolbook learning, but a question of race. Now, as a matter of fact, I do not think the annals of history contain an instance where a mongrel race has ever been able to maintain for any great length of time a stable form of government, and it is not fair to expect too much of the Filipino. Give the Filipino a chance and he will take care of himself—he will work out his own salvation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I shall be glad to yield to my friend from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to suggest to the Senator that some years ago we began to treat the Indians as separate nations, and we made treaties with them. Previous to that time we had great trouble with them, but when we established reservations and told them to go on those reservations, attend to their own affairs, have their own government, elect their own chiefs, and punish their own criminals, except for the crime of murder, they readily did it; and the result has been most wholesome as compared with the conditions which previously existed.

Mr. VARDAMAN. There is not any question in the world about that, Mr. President. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And if the Indians obtained that benefit from administering their own affairs, why would not the same be true of a people who are educated, to some extent at least?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I agree with my friend about it. I agree with the Senator most heartily, and the only way you can develop that capacity is to let them exercise it. I have my serious doubts about the Indian maintaining unassisted a government in the form of our own.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. VARDAMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator from Mississippi or the Senator from Colorado think that the Indians who were upon these reservations were maintaining an independent goverment, or were they not exercising a sort of local self-government under the absolute control of the United States, precisely what is happening in the Philippines to-day?

Mr. SHAFROTH rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will answer the Senator from Utah. I have no doubt in the world but that the Indians here in America are being treated in the proper way; but I should not be in favor, if the American Indians lived in one of the islands in the Pacific Ocean, of going there and taking charge of them in order to enforce upon them our civilization.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator another question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi further yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. VARDAMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator from Mississippi thinks the method of governing Indians by putting them in reservations and giving them a certain measure of self-government was the ideal method, can the Senator tell us why he was in favor—as I assume he was, as practically everybody was in favor—of breaking up the reservation system? It is at an end now.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That has no bearing whatever upon this question. The Indians there violated the trusts that were reposed in them, and it was thought that their wild nature should be restrained. But wherever they have shown any capacity for self-government it has always been wise and prudent to permit them to exercise it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator tell us why we have not continued to permit them to exercise those powers?

Mr. VARDAMAN. As a matter of fact they do, to a very large extent.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, we have broken up the reservation system, I think, almost altogether. I do not know of a single reservation of any consequence that is still left.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Why, certainly; they have nearly all been killed out, and we have put the remnant over here in Oklahoma. That would be the effect of the permanent occupancy by the United States of the Philippine Islands. If we hold them indefinitely, it is only a question of time when we would do as we did in the beginning, you know, in order to restrain those who declined to submit to American domination; we simply put them out of the way. People like the Filipino and the Indian always wither in the blasting breath of our benevolent civilization.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But we have gotten rid of the tribal system in Oklahoma. Those people are merged into our own citizenship.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Yes; and they have very largely been merged, in some instances, into our own race—a fact of doubtful benefit to the country.

A thousand years would not qualify the Filipino for self-government as we have it in America, and it is a waste of time to talk about it, but they are capable of maintaining a government good enough for themselves. And that is what this Congress is primarily interested in now. Just for the information of the Senators I want to call attention to the utterances of some of the leaders of public thought on the Philippine Islands. It shows, Mr. President, that the germ is there. They are—

> Troubled with the noble discontent
> That stirs the acorn to become the oak.

Analyze the profound thought and patriotic fervor attained by the great leader, Dr. Jose Rizal. He said:

> I do not mean to say that our liberty will be secured at the sword's point, for the sword plays but little part in modern affairs, but that we must secure it by making ourselves worthy of it, by exalting the intelligence and the dignity of the individual, by loving justice, right, and greatness, even to the extent of dying for them—and when a people reaches that height God will provide a weapon, the idols will be shattered, the tyranny will crumble like a house of cards and liberty will shine out like the first dawn.

No savage breast ever harbored such sentiments as that, and none other than the brain of a statesman ever conceived such noble thoughts. It is superb. It only shows "they love their land because it is their own, and scorn to give aught other reason why."

But it was not vouchsafed to him to see his dream realized, but just before the end came he expressed this sublime sentiment:

I die without seeing the dawn brighten over my native land. You, who have it to see, welcome it, and forget not those who have fallen during the night.

Mr. President, that indicates a deep yearning for liberty, a longing for freedom—and not the "desolate freedom of a wild ass," as somebody has said, but a burning desire to share in the government of his own country. I could quote at length from others who possessed in a marked degree the divine power of forethought:

"Men who, standing in the shadow of the night, were able to look beyond it, toward the coming light, and see far off with trance-prophetic eyes, the consummation of centuries." To deny such men the free use of their power and the gratification of their ambitions in their own country indicates a degree of selfishness on our part which would cause a man to burn down his neighbor's house to roast his eggs. But, Mr. President, I am not so much interested in the Filipino, however great my interest may be, as I am in our own Government. I would not carelessly violate our implied obligations to the interests in the Philippine Islands of American investors. I should like to make provision to protect those who have invested their money there, but, Mr. President, the question of dollars and cents, the question of personal profits, has no important place in this discussion. To say that the Government of the United States would prostitute its powers, punish an innocent, unoffending people, take from them the right to govern themselves in order that a few American financiers might receive large dividends upon their investments, is an affront to the intelligence, patriotism, and integrity of the American Government. We want to do the best we can for the Filipino, and we would also do the best that may be done for the American investor, but our first obligation is to our own country. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] on yesterday read an extract from a chapter in Froude's Cæsar which I think is very pertinent to this discussion. The historian says:

If there is one lesson which history clearly teaches it is this: That free nations can not govern subject provinces. If they are unable or unwilling to admit their dependencies to share their own constitution, the constitution itself will fall in pieces from mere incompetence for its duties.

Let us see to it that our own institutions and our own Government is protected. We should not knowingly do that which will recoil upon us. You can not have one form of government for the Filipino under the American flag and another form of government for the American under the same flag without doing violence to the very fundamentals of our home Government. "Safety first" is my policy. The Filipino is incapable congenitally, racially, unalterably of understanding the genius of our Government. We can not make citizens of them. That fact has been proclaimed by the Democratic Party and has received the constructive approval of the American people. We have experimented with this race question in the United States, and all agree that the body politic can not stand any more of the black virus of incompetency. We all know that race political equality means ultimate social equality—social equality will be followed in turn by race amalgamation—race amalgamation will produce race deterioration—race mongrelization, and that will be followed inevitably by disintegration and death of our civilization. Of course, Mr. President, I am speaking of races as diametrically different as the Negro, the Mongolian, and the white races.

The men and women who conceived our form of government and constructed our Constitution never dreamed we would engage in the business of holding subject provinces. It is therefore our duty to get out of the Philippine Islands and come back home, and come back to stay. In answer to the suggestions of some Senators that this Nation must expand and become a world power, that it is our duty to reach out and lead the benighted into the light, let me say, Mr. President, that is a fine sentiment. I want this Nation to become a world power, but I want it to be a world power for righteousness. I want to see it fulfill the hope and realize the dream of the incomparably great men and women who gave it being. I want to see America the biggest moral example that ever fired the imagination, delighted the human soul, or challenged the intellect of man. I want it to lead the world by its superb example of probity and justice to that high plain where the nations of the earth will adopt the principle of the golden rule rather than the rule of gold to guide them in their intercourse with each other. I want the American flag to be an emblem of liberty and the token of truth. When I was a boy living in the prostrate and bleeding Southland, after the simoom of war had withered our productive fields and laid waste to our lovely homes, where the gaunt blackened chimneys marked the trace of vandal warfare, our friends of the North were wont to point to the flag with pride and boast that beneath its sacred folds no man should wear shackles. Well, I like to contemplate it in that sense. I like to look upon it as an emblem of liberty, as a pledge of justice, as a guaranty of freedom to the Filipino in his own country as well as to the Americans; but, Mr. President, I am compelled with a sense of shame to admit that instead of the American flag that waves in the tropical breezes above the Philippine Islands being an emblem of liberty to the Filipino, it is an emblem of oppression, and its bright stars are dimmed, its white lines are stained with the tears and blood of an innocent people who have suffered, sacrificed, and died that they might be free and enjoy the liberty of free men in their own country, a privilege which we in America hold more precious than the ruddy drops that feed the patriot's heart. I sincerely hope the amendment proposed by the learned senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] may be agreed to, and the bill as thus amended passed. The American Senate will honor itself by such an act, and justice at last will have triumphed.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I am always interested in any observations which the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] offers. He has taken opportunity to express his position in reference to the military and naval policy proposed by the President, and I believe it a good opportunity briefly to state mine.

I stand with the President in his desire for an efficient Army and Navy, such an Army and Navy as are demanded by our national responsibilities, our national rights, and our national existence. We can not blind ourselves to the fact that force is still the final arbiter among the nations. To be without the means of utilizing sufficient force to defend our rights among the nations, our national integrity, and to repel aggression is to court humiliation, misery, oppression, and defeat.

Now, what is the situation? We have said, through the Monroe doctrine, to the already overcrowded nations of Europe that they shall not establish colonies, acquire territory, or extend their system on the Western Hemisphere, with its spacious reaches of rich and undeveloped resources, and this position will arouse increasing antagonism and opposition.

We have said, through our immigration laws and some of our State land laws, to the greater part of Asia—the most populous division of the globe—that its peoples can not have the rights of citizenship in our country, that they can not even come to this country, except as students or visitors, and already this attitude has brought us on one occasion to the very verge of war with Japan. A large portion of our Mexican border is in a state of uncertainty and turmoil, and it is impossible to predict what developments may there occur or how long this condition may continue. It is a well-known fact that last fall we did not have in the entire United States a force half strong enough to cope with conditions on this border.

Furthermore, we have the Philippines, Hawaii, and the Panama Canal. Their protection and defense are imperative.

Again, we are a great exporting Nation, and it is absolutely essential to our economic existence and prosperity that our great export products, such as cotton, wheat, and so forth, have fair treatment on the high seas and in the world markets. In view of these facts, it would be folly to say that we are immune from war. In view of these facts it would be madness, as I view it, not to profit by the lessons of the European war in putting our land and sea forces on an efficient and modern basis.

The first lesson of the European war is the necessity of having sufficient reserve supplies of ammunition and equipment to meet an attack, and attacks generally come suddenly. The President proposes to put our coast-defense fortifications on a proper and secure basis and to acquire sufficient material and equipment for a land force of about 500,000 men. He does not propose a permanent, regular force of 500,000 men, but it is his opinion that we should have sufficient material and equipment on hand for an army of that size.

The President proposes an increase in the Regular Army of 38,000 men, bringing the total to 141,000, a total that will give us a mobile army in continental United States of only about 50,000 men.

In addition, he proposes to ask that a maximum of 133,000 men a year for three years agree to enlist for a military training course of one or two months in each of the three years, the men and officers of this volunteer force to be paid on the same basis as the Regular Army while in training. They will then be furloughed for three years, with no other obligation than to return to the colors in the event of war or the imminence thereof. This volunteer force has been called the continental army. There is nothing compulsory about it, and if less than 133,000 men respond each year the Government will take them and do the best it can. The total number asked for per year is an average of about 120 men to each congressional district. These volunteers will be trained in their own section of the country.

The Navy plan contemplates such increase as will give us a total strength of 35 capital battleships in five years, with the necessary subsidiary ships. The Secretary of the Navy says that this will in all probability make us third among the nations in naval strength, England being first and Germany second.

The safest insurance against militarism and despotism in our Republic is to have the facilities for national defense on hand and readily available. If we do not have these in ready shape, it will be difficult to assemble them under stress of emergency without centralizing power and imperiling constitutional guaranties. In view of what Europe is suffering, we should congratulate ourselves that we have escaped so far, and should gladly pay the necessary cost of preparedness against war. Nothing will be more effective in preventing war, in securing our contentions and our rights, than knowledge on the part of the world that we are in position to utilize and mobilize in a reasonably quick time an adequate and effective land and sea force.

In raising the necessary funds I am in favor of an inheritance tax, of increasing the income tax, especially on the larger incomes, of an excise tax on munitions of war, and of an excise tax on alcoholic liquors equal to the protective tariff they now enjoy. The necessary funds can easily be raised in this way. As long as we have intoxicating liquors let them be heavily taxed. When they are abolished, as I am sure they will be, the inheritance and income taxes can be so laid as to take the place of the liquor tax. On men like Astor, the baby baron, who have acquired foreign citizenship while their incomes are derived from property protected by this Government, I am in favor of making the income tax double what it is on our own citizens.

I do not understand that the President insists on any particular method of taxation in raising the needed funds except as to an increase of the income tax.

I do not see anything approaching militarism in the President's plan. I am in favor of adequate appropriations for necessary defense, but not one cent for militarism or aggressive war.

I am in favor of the most rigid supervision of all contracts for munitions and supplies in order that exorbitant profits may be prevented, and of the manufacture by the Government itself, to the greatest extent practicable, of these munitions and supplies. It is hardly necessary for me to say that I am not in favor of compulsory service.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, no doubt there are many citizens of the United States who have business interests in the Philippine Islands and who would therefore like to see the islands permanently retained by the United States.

The American people as a whole, however, believe that the Filipinos should finally have independence. Few advocates of permanent retention by the United States have appeared to express their views or assert a justification for their position.

During the present discussion the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and others have demonstrated conclusively that the Democratic position on this subject is in favor of granting the Filipinos independence as soon as that can be done with due regard to the interests of our wards as the controlling factor.

While there is some variation in the language contained in the platforms adopted by the Democratic Party in 1900, in 1904, in 1908, and in 1912, no one can fairly resist the conclusion that it is the established policy of our party to permit the Philippine people to establish and maintain their own government upon such principles and policies as in their own opinion will best conserve their happiness and promote their progress. There have been no specific declarations by any political party in the United States against final independence for the Philippines. That policy, if it exists at all in the minds of any of our citizens, is prompted in part at least by selfish financial and commercial considerations, and if fostered or cultivated at all this is done half secretly rather than aggressively.

It seems to be the general conviction of the American people, expressed in speeches in Congress and in political campaigns, in newspaper and magazine articles and in platform addresses, that the permanent domination of the Philippine Islands by the United States is contrary to the spirit of our political institutions, which are based upon the principle that all peoples should enjoy the right of self-government when they choose to assert that right. The general state of the public mind favors early independence for the Philippines, because our administrative agencies are not peculiarly or specially designed or adapted to the control of dependent Provinces and peoples.

The danger of involving the United States in Asiatic politics through the activities of our Government in the Philippines has been discussed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. When either of these Senators discusses a subject little remains to be said for the cause he espouses. When both of them present substantially the same conclusions, no room is left for opposing arguments. I may be pardoned for adding to what they have said on this particular phase of the question my own assertion that it is the general public opinion that the permanent retention of the Philippines would inevitably involve the United States in Old World controversies, and that our possessions and control of the islands has not added cordiality to our relations with any foreign power. This opinion of the public is the result of general circumstances and conditions rather than the product of specific knowledge touching the subject, but it is nevertheless entitled to consideration in dealing with this subject, for, after all, abstract truth has little influence in controlling the conduct of individuals or of nations. Both are actuated by what they believe to be the truth, and so far as consequences are concerned prejudice is often more powerful in controlling the fate of nations than intelligence. However, I believe that this general conviction of the public that our possessions in the Philippines constitute a menace to our own peace is founded in both reason and fact, as has been established by the arguments of the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. It seems, right there, that we all lose sight of a very important thought—that while the possession of the Philippines by the United States imperils the United States, it is equally true that so long as the Philippines are a part of our possessions that fact imperils the Philippine Islands. The very history of those islands proves that they would not have been touched by the American Government had they not been a part of the possessions of Spain.

Mr. ROBINSON. I was just about to come to that feature of the discussion.

Mr. CLAPP. Then I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator need not do so. He has expressed the thought better than I could express it myself. I was just about to say that the controlling factor in the consideration of this question is the interests and the rights of the Philippine Islanders themselves, and that the security of the islands from attacks may depend upon the relinquishment of control by the United States rather than the retention of it by the United States.

Another reason, akin to the one that has been so aptly suggested by the Senator from Minnesota, justifying independence for the Philippines is found in the fact that the Filipinos themselves desire independence. This to me is a matter of emphatic importance. If I am correctly informed, the opinion predominates among the Filipinos that they are ready for self-government. When I review the history of the struggle for independence throughout the world, begun by the founders of this Republic and taken up by other peoples inspired by their example, I am convinced that this desire of the Filipinos for independence should be given great weight and should be recognized.

In this connection I refer to the oft-repeated argument that the Filipinos are not "competent" for self-government. I do not undertake, in this brief address, to discuss the question of what constitutes "competency" for self-government. Incompetency for self-government is the one argument into which all others resolve themselves against granting liberty and self-government to the Philippine people. It is true that the civilization of the Philippines differs in many respects from ours, but the same may be said of almost every other people on the globe. Race and climate and other conditions create distinguishing features in all civilizations, which are reflected in their social and political institutions. Who is the judge of when a people is competent for self-government? I assert that history vindicates the conclusion that a people must be the judge of their own capacity, and that to constitute any other nation the sole judge of when a people is or becomes competent for self-government is the basest sort of tyranny, the very source of all forms of oppression. Since, then, the Filipinos assert their right and capacity to govern themselves, according to the standards of liberty fixed by history we should accept their judgment rather than insist upon our own.

In my opinion there is only one reason why the Filipinos should not have immediate independence, and that reason is founded solely on expedience and convenience both to the Filipinos and to our own Government and people. Immediate independence would leave the islands in some respects in a state of confusion socially, politically, and industrially. It is therefore wise to take time for adjustment, to anticipate in so far as that can be done controversies and complications which would arise if independence were immediately granted, and to adjust them as fairly and as fully as possible in advance. This relates to many subjects and particularly embraces the property rights of American citizens in the islands. It would seem that two years is adequate for this purpose. It is certainly better to fix some specific time and thus settle all disputes as to our present and future policy in dealing with this subject.

This amendment has a peculiar value at this particular time. It is calculated to have an excellent moral effect on world politics. It will demonstrate the good faith, the sincerity of our pretensions to use the power of this Government primarily for the benefit of the Filipinos themselves, and emphatically contradict the implication that the real purpose of the United States in the Philippines is the exploitation of their resources for the benefit of selfish Americans. We have had many vexing questions to solve during recent years in connection with our foreign relations. Some of the most difficult are still pressing us. To declare now the policy of granting independence to the Filipinos at a fixed time will tend to strengthen the confidence of other nations in our declarations of unselfishness, and will materially aid in the peaceful and proper solution of the very difficult problems now confronting this Government in connection with conditions existing and incidents transpiring in Mexico.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator refers to this amendment as one that gives a fixed date for independence. I know the frankness and intelligence of the Senator. I should like to ask him how he reconciles the provision that the then President of the United States at the end of four years shall decide whether the provisions of the bill shall go into effect or not. It has occurred to me in reading this amendment, which, of course, has been submitted to the Senate for only two days, that far from making any definite decision of the question the introduction of that provision tends to confusion, to uncertainty, and to leave the whole matter that is involved entirely indefinite instead of being definite. It proposes at the end of four years to leave to the decision of one single man, of what political faith nobody now knows, whose opinion in regard to this particular subject nobody now knows, the solution whether or not the provisions of this bill shall really go into effect. It would seem to me, and I would be glad to have the opinion of the Senator upon the matter, that it would lead to great confusion.

Mr. ROBINSON. The amendment in the form which it is now presented provides that if, in the opinion of the President, at the expiration of the four-year period it shall be necessary or advisable for him to do so, on account of new or changed conditions, he can again submit the question to the Congress convening next after the expiration of the four-year period. But if Congress should fail to repeal or modify this legislation, the Filipinos would automatically acquire independence.

That provision does, in a measure, as suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island, diminish the effectiveness or revokes the feature of the bill granting independence within a definite time, but, in my judgment, that is no valid objection. Since the period of four years is allowed for the adjustment contemplated by the amendment and since new conditions are constantly arising, it may not be objectionable to give that power to the President, who is charged with negotiating with foreign nations interested in the subject for the neutrality of the islands.

It can not, I repeat, be objectionable to give the President that authority. I do not regard it as of the greatest importance and I would vote very cheerfully for the amendment without that feature.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator from Arkansas has referred to the external features of that provision, but the provision also instructs the President to take consideration of the internal condition of the Philippine Islands. He will have the great responsibility upon his shoulders of deciding whether at that time the civilization of the people of the islands is sufficient to answer the provisions of the bill. It is a very great responsibility to put on the shoulders of a single man.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is, indeed, a great responsibility, but this provision enables the President to share that responsibility with Congress, if he desires to do so, and in that sense it can not be objectionable to me.

Mr. LIPPITT. Does not the Senator from Arkansas think it will leave the Filipinos in a state of great doubt as to what their future condition is to be?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think so.

Mr. LIPPITT. Suppose——

Mr. ROBINSON. I have great respect for the opinions of the Senator from Rhode Island, and I imply from his statement that it would suggest a great doubt as to what the prospect for independence would be, but I think that the purpose of Congress will, beyond any material question, be carried out, and that the result of this legislation as it is now proposed will be to grant independence to the Filipinos at the expiration of four years, if not before.

Mr. LIPPITT. May I ask the Senator what he thinks would be the result of this provision if somebody of the opinion in regard to the Philippines that is entertained by ex-President Taft, for instance, should be elected President at the next election?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, there is no use of discussing impossibilities. It is not within the range of probability or possibility that anything so unfortunate as that would happen to the American or the Filipino people; but if that should transpire, the responsibility would finally be upon Congress.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMPSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If, as the Senator seems to indicate, there is objection to this provision because it does not fix a day certain, is the Senator willing to make it a day certain?

Mr. LIPPITT. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that I think the policy in regard to the Philippine Islands should be one of two things. It should either positively grant their independence on a day certain, or it should positively state that it is the purpose of the United States to carry on the policy that for the last 15 years has been of such unchallenged and unparalleled success that even the present Democratic Governor General of the islands has praised it in the most extravagant terms. I think that a half-and-half policy in connection with the Philippines is the most indefensible position that this body can take.

So when the Senator asks me that question, I answer with perfect frankness that my first choice in regard to the Philippine Islands is to help equip them for self-government. I think success in that is probably quite within our reach; but my second choice is to relieve them from all doubt of our future relation and have the courage of our convictions, which this bill has not, and say positively that we are going to do such and such a thing at such and such a time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I merely want to say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield further?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The answer to that is that this bill provides that while the President at the end of four years may take into consideration the situation at that time he has no power to prolong it longer than the adjournment of the Congress succeeding that time.

Mr. LIPPITT. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. If no action is taken it is absolute independence at the end of five years and six months.

Mr. LIPPITT. If gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber had a thorough conviction as to the advisability of this step they would not leave it to the decision of a man who perhaps would be a President hostile to their policies to decide. If they were certain that the doctrine they were trying to put into legislation would be followed by success, if they were certain that the conditions in the Philipine Islands as a result of this legislation would not be as they are in Mexico to-day, they would not put a string on this policy. They hope it will be beneficial, but are so doubtful about it that they hedge by putting the ultimate decision in the hands of a single man instead of settling it in Congress where the duty of decision belongs.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator from Rhode Island recognize that to-day it is in the hands of a single man? He can not reverse this policy at the end of 18 months, but after four years automatically the sovereignty of the United States ends.

Mr. ROBINSON. Unless Congress shall in the meantime legislate to the contrary.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Therefore it is not in the hands of one man. At the most it is in the hands of the Government.

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator will allow me, I simply invite attention to the duty of the President of the United States at the expiration of four years. If he decides that this independence is to be granted he decides what the policy of the United States will be. If he decides that it is not to be granted he throws the entire question open again for discussion. Upon what he does at the expiration of the four years will depend the future of the Philippine Islands, and the policy can not be decided until those four years have elapsed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, by way of jest, I may say it is a matter of great disappointment to me that the Senator from Rhode Island has not changed his views since I have expressed mine concerning this important question. I had expected, of course, that he would yield his views when I began the discussion on this subject.

In addition to what has already been said on this proposition, the President is given power to resubmit this matter to Congress, and that is the sole effect of the provision. If before the Filipinos acquire their independence conditions have so changed that in the opinion of the Chief Executive of this Nation he is warranted in doing so, he may again call the matter to the attention of Congress, but if Congress does not recede from the position it now takes the independence of the Filipinos will be acquired automatically as the result of this legislation.

Mr. President, another reason for speedily granting independence is that it will shorten our defense line to grant the Filipinos independence and remove the cause of possible future controversies and conflicts. It is not my purpose now to discuss the subject of "preparedness." No one can seriously deny that the independence of the Filipinos will in the near future lighten our necessary naval and military burden. Surely this is an end to be desired. Whatever view we may take of the subject of preparedness and the necessity for a prompt increase in the Army and the Navy of the United States, the conclusion is inevitable that the military burdens of this Government are already great and are destined to increase.

The difficulty of granting independence will increase with time. Every year that passes will witness the formation of new ties binding us to the Filipinos—ties of a social, a political, and an industrial nature. New business enterprises in which Americans are vitally interested are constantly springing up in the islands, and these will strengthen the influences which will seek to compel their retention. It is therefore better now to declare as definitely as may be our political policy toward the Philippines, and that is exactly what this amendment seeks to accomplish.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] has expressed some apprehension as to the effect of the clause designed to secure the neutrality of the islands for a fixed period by treaty agreements. In order to afford the Filipinos that opportunity for the enjoyment of liberty which the United States has earned for them it seems necessary to secure them from molestation for a reasonable time. In the opinion of many who have studied this question, it is the duty of the United States to do this as a complement to independence. There can be, it would seem, little objection to sharing this responsibility with other nations, and at the worst the burden upon the United States would not be increased if other nations agreed to also guarantee the independence of the Philippines when granted or recognized by our Government. In answer to the suggestion that such an arrangement would involve us in "entangling alliances" with other powers, it may be said that in a sense this is true of every treaty that we make. Our entry into the Philippines may have been a policy in conflict with the recognized principles of the early fathers of this Republic. But we can not now escape the responsibilities which are the natural outgrowth of that policy. The enforcement of such a treaty and its observance would rest upon the same basis as would the observance and enforcement of the stipulations of any other treaty. Those suggest questions which may never arise and which will be dealt with fairly and conscientiously if occasion requires. The obligation is now upon us to protect the Philippines and it certainly would not be increased but would probably be diminished if other nations solemnly assume to share that burden. Public opinion in the United States seems to me to support the proposition that a guarantee of neutrality should accompany independence. The opinions of others who have devoted more attention to the subject may be of greater value than those of one whose duties here have not called him to a particular inquiry concerning this question.

It has been demonstrated to my satisfaction during the course of this debate that the Philippine Islands are not profitable possessions when the subject is considered from a purely selfish standpoint. Of course this is not now and can never become a controlling factor in determining our course toward a weaker people. This Republic is consecrated to the promotion of liberty and justice and, we will not, we must not, destroy or neutralize the wholesome effect of our occupation of the Philippines by dominating them in our own interests.

The time is at hand when me may with honor secure to the Filipinos the boon of liberty, and by the adoption of the pending amendment this gratifying result will be assured.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss the pending amendment, but merely to make a suggestion or two with respect to it by way of amendment. I do so at this time that it may go into the RECORD, and I invite the considerate attention of the chairman of the committee and his colleagues and the Senator from Arkansas to the matter I am proposing.

A good deal of time has been taken in the consideration of this bill in discussing subjects wholly foreign to it and of some things that are related to it only in a somewhat remote way. I suppose the subject of preparedness has some relation to this subject. I have no thought now or hereafter during the consideration of this bill of expressing any views on the subject of military preparedness further than to say, which I do now, that in my opinion at the conclusion of the decimating war now raging in Europe there will be less likelihood of any great nation attacking us than for the last 50 years and a greater likelihood of peace so far as this country and the great nations of Europe are concerned. In saying that I do not wish to be understood as intimating that I am antagonistic to a reasonable preparedness. I think there is less occasion now for alarm from that source than before this war began.

Mr. President, the Senate is engaged upon a very serious and important business. This amendment proposes in a way to grant independence to the Philippines. It is proposed that we withdraw from all connection with the Philippines. As I have heretofore remarked more than once, with that general purpose I am in very hearty sympathy, but there are right ways and wrong ways, safe ways and unsafe ways of doing a business of this kind.

I can not but feel that this grave question ought not to be disposed of until Senators and everyone who shall have a voice in its disposition shall be well satisfied in his own mind that he knows, or is confident that he knows, what the effect of the thing to be done is likely to be. We ought not to enact legislation of this kind with undue haste. So far from that it ought to be done with the most careful and painstaking deliberation.

I did not see the last draft of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas until the Senate met at noon. During the day, more or less occupied with duties that demanded my attention, I have been able to give the amendment only a somewhat casual examination. In going over it I have written some amendments to it. I am not sure that the amendments will make it better or worse. I feel, Mr. President, that I ought to be sure in my own mind at least before I propose seriously, or propose at all, unless it be merely by way of suggestion, any amendment to the pending proposition.

There are just one or two of these ideas that I have attempted to formulate that I wish to put in the RECORD, as I have stated, with the hope the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the chairman of the committee, and the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] especially may examine them and give the Senate the benefit of their mature judgment; and also the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] and others who have interested themselves especially in this legislation. I am not going to stop now to undertake to go into the matter in detail. It would be a little difficult for me to make myself understood unless Senators had the amendment before them and followed the reading. They can do that later.

Mr. President, I make this suggestion of an amendment to the so-called Clarke amendment. After the word "Philippines," in the twenty-first line, page 3, of the amendment, strike out the period, substitute a semicolon, and insert:

or if the President shall be unable to make a treaty or other binding agreement in the form hereinbefore stated with any of the said-mentioned principal nations, then to invite the cooperation of said nation or nations so refusing to enter into such form of treaty or agreement to make each for itself a treaty or convention with the United States obligating and pledging itself to recognize and respect the sovereignty and independence of the said Philippines and the government thereof.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Senator will yield for a moment, I will state that it seems to me a clause of that kind is very wise. There was a period of time when the Hawaiian Islands were the subject of controversy between various nations. England had them for a time, and Daniel Webster obtained an agreement with France and England that neither of those countries would assume sovereignty over those islands, and it was absolutely respected as long as they remained an independent government. If we can not get the neutrality agreement in the sense of defending the Philippines with arms, we could have a negative defense in the way that they would not themselves attempt to subjugate the islands.

Mr. STONE. The text of the amendment is to this effect:

Immediately upon the passage of the act the President shall invite the cooperation of the principal nations interested in the affairs of that part of the world in which the Philippines are located, in the form of a treaty or other character of binding agreement, whereby the cooperating nations shall mutually pledge themselves to recognize and respect the sovereignty and independence of the said Philippines, and also to mutually obligate themselves, equally and not one primarily nor to any greater extent than another, to maintain as against external force the sovereignty of said Philippines.

It might be that some of these nations who are interested in that region of the world, it might be that all of them, would refuse to enter into a solemn compact or convention pledging themselves to use force if need be, for that would be the meaning of it, to maintain the political integrity and independence of the islands.

I have submitted an additional clause, an alternative clause, to which I ask the attention of the gentlemen in charge. I am not going to discuss it now; I merely wish to get it before them.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. Do I understand that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri intends that this guaranty shall be obtained before we shall surrender authority? The amendment as it is now drawn leaves that to be acted upon after they have left our jurisdiction and when we have no control over them. Does the Senator think that that would be an opportune time to secure an agreement of that kind?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I intended to touch upon that. I do not think what I have suggested exactly touches that question, but I think it an important question.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator if he does not himself believe that it would be better to get any kind of an agreement concerning the future of the Philippine Islands while they are still in our possession and while it would be pertinent for us to secure such an agreement rather than after they have left our authority and ceased to be a part of our territory? It might be regarded as impertinent on our part then to ask any foreign Government to enter into an agreement with us to protect an independent government.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, just a moment later, after I had suggested one or two amendments, I intended to ask the Senators who are collaborating, I presume, in the preparation of this amendment to consider the very question suggested by the honorable Senator from North Dakota. It seems to me to be very important indeed.

If any nation should enter into an agreement with us of the nature we have in mind, we may well depend upon this, that, as the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has stated, such nation or nations are not apt to make such agreement with us after we have withdrawn our sovereignty over the islands, recognized a government established by the people there as an independent nation, and have sent our accredited representatives to that Government. Far more apt would such nations be to look with favor on an invitation of the kind suggested in the amendment if extended before the sovereignty of the Philippines was established and recognized; aye, more apt still to look with favor upon such an invitation if our recognition of the independence of the Philippines in some way depended upon the entering into agreements or conventions in advance of such recognition.

Mr. President, I believe that the language of this amendment, though well thought out and though it embodies in the main a policy I approve and have long advocated, might be changed so as to accomplish the result more certainly than to leave it as it is, and in this connection I throw out this observation: The amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and that offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], which is an amendment to the amendment, limits the neutralization, so called, of the islands to a period of five years from the date of the recognition and the withdrawal of our authority over them. I submit to Senators that it is not within, or hardly within, the range of probability—or possibility I came near saying, and I will say of possibility—that within five years after the United States has voluntarily abandoned the Philippines and withdrawn from the exercise of sovereignty over an area of such moment, some other nation would go in, attack the Filipinos, and undertake to absorb them within five years.

Why, Mr. President, an act of that kind would be an act of such insolence, of such an offensive character, as would arouse the indignation of every American, and I do not believe any nation on the earth would venture to do it within so short a period.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that in the substitute that I have offered, to which the Senator has made reference, the language is "not less than five years." I thought it wise to give the President leeway for any term longer than five years.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I will vote for the bill with the five-year limitation upon it if Senators desire to put it that way, making it the minimum or the maximum, or leaving it to the discretion of the President; but I would do so with the very greatest reluctance and apprehension. I am not going to discuss the matter now any further.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want to ask the Senator from Missouri to indulge me for just a moment.

Mr. STONE. I yield to the Senator; certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask if the Senator will permit me to request permission to insert in the remarks submitted by me a short time ago certain extracts from articles written by Filipinos, which go to show their capacity for understanding government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The fact that I have to leave the Chamber at this moment is the reason why I asked the Senator from Missouri to permit me to interrupt him.

Mr. STONE. I am very sorry that the Senator from Mississippi has to go, for I am about through, and he has been giving attention to this matter.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should be very glad to listen to the Senator.

Mr. STONE. I should like the Senator from Mississippi to be present.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator just one other question right here?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Would not the fixing of any date for the limitation be equivalent on our part to an admission that we would consent to the islands being seized at any time thereafter?

Mr. STONE. Well, I would hardly go that far—that it could be interpreted as a consent on our part; but it would, of course, have the effect of withdrawing our responsibility for in any wise interfering unless by a mere formal protest.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question. The line of his argument and the question propounded by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] seem to involve an idea contrary to the one that I thought was intended to be worked out by those who are proposing this amendment. What we are attempting to do now is to get ourselves out of the Philippines as soon as possible, to wash our hands of all responsibility as to their independence, their mode of government, and so forth. It might aid us in extending independence to them to get the cooperation of other governments, but the responsibility is now on us, and it seems to me that whether or not the time when we declare their independence antedates the time when we ask the cooperation of other governments, our responsibility is in no wise lessened. This discussion seems to cause us to lose sight of the fact that our main object is to relieve ourselves of all responsibility in the Philippines as soon as may be.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I listen, of course, with interest to the suggestions of my friend from South Carolina, but I do not care at this time to be tempted into a discussion of this question. I am merely stating one or two things for the consideration particularly of the members of the committee. They may be of no value in their minds or of not sufficient value to induce them to make any change or suggest any change in the phraseology of the bill.

In line 23, on page 3, I suggest that the words "decline to do so" be stricken out, and that the words "decline to make or enter into any or either form of treaty, agreement, or pledge hereinabove provided for" be inserted.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think the words "or fail" might be inserted in the Senator's amendment, so that it will read "decline or fail."

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I could not hear what the Senator from Missouri read. Would he object to again reading the clause which he wants inserted?

Mr. STONE. Of course I could read it again, but unless the Senator from Rhode Island was following me closely——

Mr. LIPPITT. I was following the Senator very closely; but would he let me read the amendment myself so as not to consume any time?

Mr. STONE. Certainly, I will hand the amendment to the Senator.

Mr. President, I am going to close with a brief reference to the closing paragraph of the Clarke amendment. As it appears in the pending amendment that paragraph reads:

If any of the nations so invited to join the United States in such undertaking shall decline to do so, then the President shall include as parties to such convention or agreement such nations as may be willing to join therein and to assume such obligations; and if none are willing to so unite therein, then the President is authorized to give such guaranty on behalf of the United States alone for the period of five years from and after the expiration of said period of four years, or any extension thereof, and pending the existence of such separate guaranty by the United States, the United States shall be entitled to retain and exercise such control and supervision in the said Philippines as may be necessary to enforce order therein and to avoid external complications.

I would ask Senators—and I would have been glad to have had an expression from the author of this amendment if he were present, but for the moment he seems to be out of the Senate—what would be the effect if some of the nations, one or two of the nations, invited to join the United States in this suggested convention or treaty should do so and others should not? For example, let us suppose that Great Britain and Germany would consent to enter into such an agreement, but that Japan and France should decline to do so, what embarrassment would face the President in that situation?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I take it that that is one of the reasons why there is a reservation in the amendment as to a report being made to Congress before the expiration of the full four years. There is one year and about six months allowed for Congress to act with relation to the matter. The President can then report such suggestions with reference to it as he desires; and I take it that he would do so if only a few of the nations were willing to join in the arrangement.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Colorado is mistaken in that. The President is permitted to extend this four-year period only upon certain conditions. When I come to address myself to the amendment I shall point out that those conditions are inadequate and do not cover the conditions suggested by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, inasmuch as this matter of an international agreement with regard to the Philippine Islands is something that seems to be in the sole power of the United States Government to determine, the President at any time during the full period of four years, or during the period of a year and a half thereafter, could call the attention of Congress to and could secure the enactment of any legislation with relation to it that the situation at that time might demand.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have prepared hastily, and therefore imperfectly, several amendments to the text of the pending amendment; but with what I have said I believe I shall not further detain the Senate this afternoon, especially as the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has expressed a wish to address the Senate.

Mr. LIPPITT. May I ask the Senator, merely detaining him a second, would he not ask to have his amendments printed in connection with the pending amendment, so that they might be seen as a whole?

Mr. STONE. I would do so if I had them in form.

Mr. LIPPITT. From the manner in which he stated them, I thought the Senator had them in the shape he desired.

Mr. STONE. No; I have simply written the amendments in the body of a copy of the pending amendment I have before me.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the Senator from Missouri takes his seat, or after he has taken his seat, if he will honor me with his attention, I should like to ask him one or two questions with regard to the meaning of the amendment, which evidently he has studied with care.

I call his attention now to the last clause on page 4. Suppose the President has, after the two years and before the expiration of the four years, recognized the government established in the Philippines and has been unsuccessful in securing the cooperation of any other nation in the guaranty that is here proposed, is this act mandatory upon the President to enter into the guaranty that is here described, or is it within his discretion to do so or not?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I had supposed that if none of the nations entered into this proposed agreement or treaty the Government of the United States would be, in effect, under the text of the amendment, pledged to guarantee the independence of the islands, and that during that period it should continue to exercise the degree of authority set forth.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am, of course, speaking of the five years after the full recognition of independence or of the government established in the Philippines. The language of the amendment is:

And if none are willing to so unite therein, then the President is authorized to give such guaranty on behalf of the United States alone.

I have been very much in doubt whether that language would require the President to give the guaranty or whether it would simply permit him to give the guaranty. If it simply permits him to give the guranty, or authorizes him to give it, then we are allowing that question to be determined by the President alone, which is rather a vast discretion to impose upon the President.

Mr. STONE. However that may be, Mr. President, it is hardly worth while for the Senator from Iowa and myself to discuss that question, for if we are going to enter upon the policy outlined in the part of the amendment read by the Senator, then there ought to be no doubt, in my opinion, as to what the attitude of the Government of the United States is. I would not leave it as a matter of discretion to the President, and if the language is subject to a criticism of that kind it ought to be changed.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with the Senator from Missouri that it ought not to be within the discretion of the Executive. While I am opposed to any guaranty of any sort after recognition and separation, yet, if we are to enter into the guaranty, it ought to be by the direction of the Congress and not through the will of the person who happens at that time to be President of the United States.

Mr. STONE. Of course, if I went into that I would have to discuss the subject at considerable length, which I am not desirous of doing at this time.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to address the brief remarks which I have to make, which will only take me a few moments, both to the chairman of the Committee on the Philippines [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

I think there are three very patent defects in the amendment which has just been discussed. The first is in the matter of securing a guaranty, the second is in the time of securing that guaranty, and the third is in the five-year limitation of our interest over the islands. Now, I want to put this in the form of a question to the Senator from Missouri or the Senator from Nebraska: Why should we ask other nations to give a guaranty that they will join in the protection of the independence of the Philippine Islands? Would it not be far more easy for us to get a simple agreement of those nations that they would not interfere with the independence of the Philippine Islands, rather than an agreement that they would interfere with any other nation that should question their right to independence?

Suppose you adopt this provision in the form in which it now is, do you believe for one single moment, when you stop to consider it, that you could get an agreement, say, from Japan, or that she would enter into a guaranty, which would mean that she would wage war, if necessary, with another government in order to protect the independence of the Philippine Islands? Suppose, for instance, that Japan should reason along this line: "If Germany and America should get into war, the first act of Germany probably might be to attack the Philippine Islands. Now, if I enter into an agreement of this kind I must immediately become the ally of the United States to expel Germany from the Philippine Islands." Do you believe that Japan would enter into any such agreement, and do you believe that any other one of the great powers would enter into that agreement? Do you think you could get Germany to say, after we have left all control of those islands to the Filipinos themselves, that if Japan attacks those islands—and the moment Japan became involved in war with the United States, by the law of nations all treaty obligations between Japan and the United States would be abolished—do you imagine that Germany would enter into an agreement which would require her to say, "If Japan breaks the agreement or gets into war with the United States—which of itself would break that obligation—and attacks the Philippine Islands, we will become an ally of the United States in an attempt to get Japan out of those islands because she has guaranteed their independence"?

No, Mr. President, we will never get the guaranty of the great nations of the world to protect those islands from some other nation; but what we can do is this—and we would not be impertinent in asking it—we can say, just as I have indicated in a little amendment which I have presented:

The President of the United States is hereby authorized and requested to indicate to the great powers of the world the desire of this Government to extend to the Philippine Islands and the Philippine people full and complete independence whenever it shall be warranted in the belief that such independence will be permanent and be respected by the other powers of the world.

Then I provide that the President be authorized to enter into such an arrangement with the other powers of the world, conditioned that this country will not surrender her sovereignty until she knows that that sovereignty will be acquired by the islands and will be respected by the nations of the world.

While those islands are ours, it is very proper for us to ask other nations of the world, "Will you respect their independence if we grant them their independence?" When those islands cease to be ours, it would be an act of impertinence on our part to attempt to get other nations to enter into an agreement with us to respect their independence, and, much more for the reasons that I have mentioned, to guarantee the independence of those islands. So, if we are going to get any kind of an agreement, that agreement ought, first, not to be a guaranty, because we will never get that, and it ought not to contain a specific time limit, because the moment that we fix a time limit we indicate to them and indicate to the world that our interest in the welfare and independence of the islands ceases upon a given date. We do not want to say that to the world. What we want, and what the islands want, is their independence, and, in my candid judgment, the nations of the world will be glad to enter into an agreement that they will not interfere with those islands if we surrender our jurisdiction over them.

Five years from now! Why should you fix 5 years? Why should you fix 10 years or 20 years? When we have an agreement on the part of the nations of the world to let them alone, that is indefinite; and it will take a new contract in all good faith for that Government to make the agreement with us, and we will have two parties to the contract.

I think we may just as well eliminate from our minds now the idea that after we have surrendered those islands we will ever get any agreement from any nation in the world that they will go to war with us or against us in order to protect the independence of those islands, and I hope we will be able to make the modifications that have been indicated in the last amendment. I think my amendment is far preferable, because the very first act is to get the agreement. The moment we have that agreement from the principal nations of the world, then the President is to call a constitutional convention in the Philippine Islands. As soon as that constitutional convention is held, a republican form of government organized, an election held, and officers elected under that, so that they start upon their life of independence, then, by a proclamation, the President of the United States gives notice to the world that they are a free and independent people. It is simple of operation and sure of operation if we want to allow the Philippine people their independence.

I wish to grant it to them; but I say candidly that I do not want to vote for a bill that will give them their independence before that independence has been secured by some kind of an arrangement with foreign nations. I do not want a guaranty, because I know we can not get it. I do want a simple agreement to let them alone before we take our hands off of them. Then, and at that time, we can secure such an arrangement.

I hope, Mr. President, that we will not tie ourselves to any preconceived, hurried draft of any amendment without stopping to think what its effect is going to be, or make it a partisan question in any manner, but that if we really want to give them independence, if we really want to secure that independence, we will take a simple and straightforward way of securing it. If we want a guaranty or an agreement, it will have to be obtained while that is our territory, and not afterwards.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I am very much in sympathy with a part of the view entertained by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. If we are going to get any guaranty of any kind, I think it ought to be obtained before we declare the independence of the Philippines. But I want to suggest a thought to the Senator from North Dakota.

It strikes me as a very unusual thing for us to ask any nation to agree not to interfere with the Philippine Islands. Suppose some other nation had a dependency that they contemplated releasing their sovereignty over, and they should come to us and say: "Now, we want you to agree, before we release this dependency, that you will never take it over as a part of your sovereignty." We would naturally inquire what there was in our past that would suggest the probability of our interfering with the sovereignty of a free and independent nation. On the other hand, there would be nothing that could be regarded as a reflection in our saying in advance to other nations: "We propose to surrender sovereignty over a people here that are not very well equipped for defense, and we invite you to join with us in a guarantee of their independence."

No nation could take any exception to that kind of an invitation, while it does seem to me that a nation would be inclined to take exception when we propose to surrender our sovereignty conditioned upon saying to nations that have shown so far no disposition to take the Philippines that we can not do it until they agree in advance that they will observe the independence of a free and independent country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to press that same argument home to him in a question?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose Great Britain should say: "Now, Canada would like to be a free and independent government. We desire to give her that independence, provided we feel satisfied that her independence would be respected, and we ask you to enter into an agreement with us that you will also recognize and respect the independence of Canada." I can see that that would be appropriate; but if Great Britain should ask us to guarantee the independence of Canada, I can very readily see that we would say: "No; we will not interfere with Canada's independence, but we will not attempt to guarantee it by the force of this country."

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, it strikes me just the other way. Of course it is a delicate matter to talk about Canada, which is our neighbor; but I can understand how we could accept a suggestion from Great Britain that they proposed to separate from Canada, that Canada never had maintained any army or navy, was a peaceful country and unprepared for war, and "now we invite you, the United States, to join with us in an international agreement to maintain the integrity of Canada."

Of course I concede that it is going to be difficult to get any nation to agree to maintain the independence of a nation that is free, and of its own volition to get into involved propositions and conditions and situations that might invite war. But when we have lived side by side with these people, with nothing in our career—unless it is our recent exploitation of over-sea territory—that may have suggested to other nations that it is necessary to take a guaranty from us, it seems to me that it would not strike the people of the United States as a very agreeable proposition to have it suggested on the part of Great Britain that it would not do to sever her relations with Canada until she got an agreement from us that we would be decent and behave ourselves and not attempt the subjugation of Canada.

With this proposition of the Senator's we go to the other nations of the world, nations that have shown no disposition to interfere with the Philippine Islands, and we say, "We will let the Philippine Islands go if you will agree not to attempt to bring them under your own sovereignty." It strikes me that it would grate somewhat harshly upon any nation to say to them, in effect, "We would like to free these people, but before we can let them go we must have your guaranty that you will not try to subdue them."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I thought the Senator from Minnesota was about to refer to an episode in our own history. I ask him whether the inquiry he has just mentioned, made of other nations, would not be the equivalent of asking them not to do what we did in 1898 and 1899?

Mr. CLAPP. That is what I say with reference to Canada, the illustration of the Senator from North Dakota. We have gone on taking over-sea territory, and England might be justified, in view of that history, in asking from us that we would let Canada alone. But we make that same suggestion, then, to every nation that we invite to join in an agreement, not to guarantee with us and with one another the independence of the Philippine Islands but that they will be decent and fair and not themselves interfere with that independence. It does strike me that that would not appeal very strongly to the ordinary nation.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. LIPPITT. While the Senator is discussing these contingencies, I should like to ask him what he thinks we ought to do in case we asked some of these nations, and some of them should decline to agree, not to interfere with the Philippine Islands. Suppose we asked Japan, suppose we asked Germany and England, and all three of them refused to agree that they would not consider taking over the Philippine Islands. Would we then abandon our control and interest in the islands, and nevertheless maintain and extend the Monroe doctrine—which that practically amounts to—to such far-off countries as the Philippine Islands? Would the Senator approve of that?

Mr. CLAPP. I would approve of that, because if I were the Japanese Government and this country said to me, "We will release the Philippine Islands upon condition that you will agree not to take over their independence and make them a part of your sovereignty," I would say, "There is nothing in the history of this Nation to warrant any such suggestion," and I believe every nation would refuse to accept the suggestion involved in that kind of a request.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, does the Senator think that Germany, for instance, would be more likely to enter into an agreement with us that she would guarantee the integrity of the Philippine Islands against Japan than she would simply to enter into an agreement with us that she would not interfere with the independence of the Philippines?

Mr. CLAPP. I certainly think so; because what is there in the history of that empire to suggest that it is unsafe to launch a people here upon a free and independent career without first getting their guaranty that they will not seize upon that independent nation?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I am speaking of the proposition of getting an agreement from Germany that she will guarantee the Philippine Islands against any encroachment of Japan.

Mr. CLAPP. As I said a moment ago, this proposition to get a guaranty of the other nations as to the integrity of the government of the Philippine Islands is a difficult proposition. For one, I do not believe in it; but I do think the nations would much more readily join in an invitation extended to them to come in together and guarantee collectively the independence of those islands. I think that would be far better than to go to these nations with the suggestion that "We can not let these islands go until we get a guaranty from you that you will leave them alone."

Mr. McCUMBER. But, Mr. President, if I may appeal to the Senator again, by the amendment which has been offered, we are saying this word not to one individual State but to all of them. They understand that before we cease our sovereignty or release it in any way we want an understanding with all of the countries. I confess that I can see no difference in the delicacy of the situation in asking all of the Governments to join with us in saying that they will refrain from any interference with the independence of the Philippine Islands and asking them to join together to go to war, if necessary, to protect the Philippine Islands against any country that should happen to be at war with us.

Mr. CLAPP. It is not so much an invitation to go to war. One is an invitation that appeals to the strength and the generous impulse of nations to help maintain the independence of these islands when we free them. The other is a suggestion that we, who took them once, will not now let them go until we get the guaranty of the other nations that they will not invade or take possession of the islands. One is an appeal to their generosity and to their strength. The other is the suggestion of a cupidity on their part that many of them, at least, have not done anything to warrant our suggesting.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, and I give notice that beginning to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to take up the unfinished business immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, so that it may be pressed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

FLOOD AT YUMA, ARIZ.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 86) for repair and rebuilding of the levee at Yuma, Ariz., and I direct the attention of the Senator from Arizona to the report.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. It is the same matter I had up this morning, to be perfectly frank with the Senate. I have taken a poll of the committee, and no objection is urged by any member of it, and it is signed by all the committee to whom I have presented it, with the exception of one member.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What is the subject of the resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. To appropriate $50,000 to build a dam at Yuma, Ariz.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I am in favor of the joint resolution and have no objection to its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 26, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 25, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

With gratitude welling up in our hearts to Thee, O God our Father, for the gift of life and the splendid opportunities to grow and expand it to full and symmetrical proportions "till we all come unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ," we come to Thee for wisdom, strength, and courage, that we may meet the responsibilities of to-day, for it will pass and come no more again. In service to our fellow men is life and liberty, joy and happiness. A generous thought, a kind word, a helping hand is ours to give. "Let us not be weary in well-doing, for in due season we shall reap if we faint not. As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men," and pass on our way in faith, hope, and love. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. ADAMSON. To make a request for unanimous consent. My colleague, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS], delivered an address at the dedication of a monument erected by an appropriation made by Congress, under the auspices and direction of the Fine Arts Commission, and I request unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing that address in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech made by his colleague [Mr. EDWARDS] at a monument dedication. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the road bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of rivers. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

THE COMMON DEFENSE.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for 20 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, in the quietude of my garden last summer and autumn I reached certain conclusions which I have hesitated to express, thinking that I might modify them. But as time has gone on and events have occurred, it has seemed to me even more certain that my conclusions were right than when I first reached them; and I think, in justice to myself and, I hope, with some slight benefit to the country, I ought to express those conclusions to the House.

It is well known in the House that I never have been a believer in a large standing Army, and I suppose that probably I have been properly classed among those who are sometimes referred to as the "little-navy men." But wise men ought to be able to peer, maybe indistinctly, into the future and to prepare to-day for what may come to-morrow. The world is in the most anomalous condition which mankind has ever seen. The greatest struggle of all the ages is going on now between the most powerful forces of the human race, between great nations and combinations of nations, until we are the only large, powerful nation not yet involved in that struggle. It is a break-up in the world, each side fighting not merely for its own existence, as it believes, but, as it seems to me, each side fighting with the determination to put the other side, as it were, out of business. We have never had such a thing in the world before, with the same powerful influences at work.

The laws of civilization, international laws, the laws of humanity, are usually disregarded, at least more or less, when two great forces are fighting for mastery. When two men are fighting, each believing that he is fighting for his life, each determined to take the life of the other, neither one pays much attention to the desires, the requests, or the demands of some less powerful person not engaged in the conflict.

I do not know, and no one knows, what will result from the present war. No one knows whether the aggression on either side against our interests may possibly, against our desires and contrary to our wishes, finally lead us, perhaps not into this struggle, but into some struggle which is the outcome of this one. I doubt whether a paper peace between the two struggling parties now, even if it could be entered into, would be even the beginning of the end. I think the present conflict is liable and likely to last for many years before it is definitely determined either that one or the other is the master or that neither can become the master. And it seems to me that the part of wisdom for us is to prepare ourselves fairly for any possible trouble that may come. [Loud applause.]

It may be that we will have no trouble. I hope we may not. In this war I am neutral. I think we ought to maintain peace at all hazards. And yet the time may come when we shall not have the determination whether we can maintain peace or not, because, however much we may desire peace, it is not within our power, with the feelings which we have, to stand aggression too far.

It will be expensive to prepare for peace. Two years ago a billion dollars seemed a very large sum of money. No one would have believed two years ago that either England or Germany could carry on a war at the expense already involved, amounting to billions of dollars, where the interest on the indebtedness is sufficient to carry on the ordinary governmental work. And the end of that indebtedness is not in sight. What may come out of such immense burdens of debt in these countries, even when peace may be declared, no one can tell. Revolutions are not improbable, and revolutions in the history of the world have usually led to aggression and disputes and often to war with other countries. We can better afford to-day to spend hundreds of millions of dollars or a few billions of dollars in ample preparation for trouble and avoid it, if possible, than to wait for trouble and then spend untold billions before we are finally victors, as we would be. [Applause.] If we are involved in no trouble, we shall be getting off cheaply with the expenditures for preparation. If we should be involved in trouble, the money we spend now will be worth manyfold that which we would spend after the trouble began. [Applause.]

I know gentlemen are sincere in their belief that there will be no trouble. I sympathize with those who prefer to spend the money of the people in the way of investment, in aiding our own people at home, rather than for the support of idle armies or navies. But when the trouble does come, if it should come, there would be no dissentient voice against spending all our means, if necessary, to defend our country and our homes, and it were wise for us now, it seems to me, to commence our preparation.

I do not intend to discuss the details, though I have reached the conclusion myself that it were well, as an emergency measure, to increase our Regular Army to 250,000 or 300,000, or even half a million men [applause]; that we should increase or provide our fortifications, so that our coasts may be fairly, amply protected, and that we should provide a Navy which will be able to defend us on the sea. I have much more fear, in the end, of war with England than I have of war with Germany. [Applause.]

Events are coming rapidly in the world. We may sit by and wait in contentment, and yet it is our duty, as the managers of a great country and a powerful people, to provide for their protection against possibilities as well as against certainties. I think, then, that we ought to provide these great forces; that it ought to be considered as an emergency matter, entirely apart from the ordinary routine expenses of Government, without regard to partisanship or party lines. [Applause.] If England and France and Germany and Italy can consider their propositions without party lines, a country like ours ought to be able to sweep aside mere partisan considerations and try all to stand together, loyal to the country, in the effort to aid the administration of the Government.

I think, further, that we ought to provide in some way for the building up and the strengthening of our home industries, so that if we shall become involved in war we may be able to live within ourselves. [Applause.] And I think as far as possible that question should be considered entirely apart from former partisan opinion, in the hope that in some way we may get together in the interest of our country, if we should become involved in a struggle with a foreign power.

I have spoken thus very briefly, not with rhetoric or fancy phrase, because it seems to me that if there ever was a time in the history of our country when we ought to invite and receive expressions of opinion from all sides, this is one of the times, with a firm determination that out of it we will bring results; a combination of the opinions of all, without expressing the views of any, which we and all of our people may stand for, that we may uphold in the future our national honor and our national integrity; and, it seems to me, possibly our modern civilization, which I fear may break down on the other side of the water. Let us try to think what is for the best of our country, what we would do if we had each one the supreme authority and responsibility, if it were placed upon each one to determine whether he would take the chance of disaster in the future or prepare now to prevent that disaster. [Prolonged applause.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes on Thursday, after the approval of the Journal; and, if such consent is granted, I propose to address myself to the subject, "The real causes for the necessity of getting ready."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] asks unanimous consent that on next Thursday, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of the business on the Speaker's table, he be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes, subject to the conditions imposed on all these speeches, that they are not to interfere with appropriation bills or privileged matters. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from West Virginia rise?

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. I rise for the purpose of asking the unanimous consent of the House that I be permitted to address the House to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal, on the subject of peace.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman from West Virginia permit me to suggest that to-morrow is Calendar Wednesday, and that we have a very important bill up, where the time is necessarily limited?

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. I would quite agree with the gentleman from Illinois, but I fear I shall not be here Friday.

Mr. MANN. To-morrow is Wednesday.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. I will call it up later. I do not want to interfere with the business of the House. I would take only perhaps 25 minutes to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from West Virginia change his request to Thursday?

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. I shall not be here Thursday, Mr. Speaker. I will just let it go by for the present.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Washington rise?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. To ask unanimous consent that on Thursday, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN], I be permitted to address the House for 40 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that next Thursday, at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN], he be permitted to address the House for 40 minutes, subject, of course, to the restrictions that are put on all these speeches. Is there objection.

There was no objection?

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] is recognized for 30 minutes.

THE COMMON DEFENSE.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, except for the application of a general doctrine to a particular interest or, rather, to a particular locality, it would be gross impertinence on my part to address this House at this time upon the conclusion of the magnificent, patriotic, American address of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. [Applause.] I rise to do so because on the morrow the President of the United States journeys to the city which I have the honor in part to represent.

The President of the United States is the President of us all, whether we voted for him or not. He will be cordially welcomed in that great American city; welcomed for many reasons; welcomed because of the high office which he holds; welcomed because of his learning and ability; and welcomed because of his high personal character as a man. Yes; more than that; he will be welcomed because the errand on which he comes is popular in the community to which he goes.

There is another reason why he will be cordially welcomed, if the President chooses to avail himself of it. Personally I am of what passes in this country for old lineage. My most recent foreign ancestor came here in the eighteenth century, and I have only an intellectual appreciation of the fact that a man may be the best possible American citizen and yet retain a warmth of affection for the land of his birth or of his ancestry. But the President in that regard, going to that great American city, is doubly fortunate. I have no doubt that his biography, as published in the Congressional Directory, was submitted to him and is correct. Amongst other things, he says his father was a native of Ohio and his mother of Scotland, and his ancestry on both sides is Scotch-Irish.

In that city of over 5,000,000 people, now the largest city in the world, there are thousands among the citizens and the residents who can understand with an affectionate warmth the purpose which impelled the President of the United States in referring in his autobiography to the land of the birth of his mother; and we, who are in whole or in part of Celtic ancestry—and there are many such in the city to which he is going—will agree with him that his mother, and therefore himself, came from one of the best race stocks that there is.

But the President of our country, if he will avail himself of it, can at once touch the heartstrings of the majority of our people by alluding to the fact, which must be present in his heart, that a man can be a loyal American citizen and yet love the customs, the songs, the people, and have an interest even in the present affairs of the country from which at least one of his parents came.

Mr. Speaker, many things are necessary under the general head of preparedness. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has spoken of both material and spiritual things which are necessary. For my part I purpose to speak largely along the lines of those matters which come under the head of spiritual rather than material preparation; for, first and foremost, if we are to be prepared for any emergency, we must be ourselves a united people. The Scotch-Irish people, of whom the President is one, belong largely to one great church, a church to which some of us here have also the honor of belonging, and which we hold in affectionate regard. In the old days of the Scotch kirk, when a member of one of those Presbyterian churches was starting out upon a journey or toward the accomplishment of a great purpose, it was the pious duty of a fellow member to give him a word of Scripture to be of assistance to him on his journey. Oh, I would that as a fellow Presbyterian I could, before the President made his recent address to this House, have given him a word of Scripture, which I now give him in all seriousness to take to that great city which I love. This is the phrase:

But let all men be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath, for the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God.

If the President had had that phrase in his mind, he would have hesitated before, on very slight evidence, he used those particular words in which he segregated a portion of our citizenship, notably a certain portion born abroad. For the President is not unfriendly to people of foreign birth. I do him the justice willingly to admit that, and to call swiftly to the attention of this House the fact that the words of scorn which he heaped upon unknown and unnamed persons were followed in the next sentence by one of the most generous tributes to citizens of foreign birth ever uttered in this House by either President or Member. The President simply was misled by some one; and as he journeys to our great city, he can do the cause which he represents no greater good than by demonstrating that even a President of the United States is not too great nor too proud to apologize for a statement made almost without foundation.

For what are the facts about this allegation as to persons of foreign birth involved in plots? I have addressed two resolutions of inquiry, one to the President, one to the Attorney General. The newspapers inform us that the names have been sent to our Judiciary Committee, although the Judiciary Committee has not brought them to the attention of the House. And during these long months of war I find that of citizens of German birth there is just one, or possibly there are two, who have been even accused of violations of our neutrality laws [applause], Mr. Lyendecker, of New York City; and if Mr. Schulteis, of Illinois, is an American citizen of German birth, then the number is two instead of one.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. BENNET. For a question; yes.

Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman mean to say to the House that he interprets the speech of the President to the effect that his criticism was directed toward people born of German parentage or in Germany?

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, the speech was interpreted by the country to relate to American citizens in this country who had been born subjects or citizens of the central powers; and the President, as a scholar of ability and a man of learning, should have realized that in the condition of the public mind his speech would have been so interpreted.

The President of the United States can, if he will——

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. BENNET. For a question.

Mr. BORLAND. The President having clearly limited his remarks to actual offenders, why does the gentleman say that any such interpretation as that should necessarily be placed on his speech, when it was distinctly limited to men who were actual offenders against the American laws?

Mr. BENNET. Because out of a total foreign-born population in our country of something over 14,000,000 the proofs show that but one man has been even accused of a violation of our neutrality laws, a number so infinitesimal that neither the President of the United States nor anyone else in a high position of responsibility should have agitated our united citizenship by an implication which, coming from such a source, must have been considered to refer to large numbers. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. BENNET. Just for a question; but I desire to give notice that after that I shall not yield, as I see my time is short.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does not the gentleman know that when the President made that reference he referred only to those who were classed as anarchists in this country, those who were trying to blow up buildings and destroy powder works in the United States in their efforts to aid warring factions across the waters? Does not the gentleman know that the President did not mean to reflect upon the great body of patriotic Germans and Hungarians and others born on foreign soil but now obedient to our laws and loyal to our flag?

Mr. BENNET. I say again, patiently, that I have no doubt that the impression was conveyed to the country that the President did refer to people who were engaged in plots such as that, but also that he referred to those who were born under the jurisdiction of the central powers, and that if the President had investigated he would have found out that the accusation was against only one man who came within that class, and that being so, he ought not to have said it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman mean, then, that the——

Mr. BENNET. I said I would decline to yield further, and I must decline.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I regretted the speech that was made here by my warm personal friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], because it has made more difficult the task to which he and the President of the United States have addressed themselves, differing only in detail. We can not go forward as a united people unless we are united, and we can not be united if Representatives in Congress, or the President of the United States, or Members of the body at the other end of the Capitol by word or speech segregate any part of our common citizenship. [Applause.]

I did not rise to defend that large body of voters in my congressional district who are of German birth and ancestry, and I shall not defend them now, because the German stock in this country is as old as that of any other country. And if the gentleman from Massachusetts had exercised his memory—for he has the knowledge—he would have recalled that the very first Speaker of the House of Representatives was a German. [Applause.] He was the son of that distinguished Lutheran clergyman who rose in his pulpit during the Revolutionary War, preached a forceful sermon of adherence to the Revolutionary cause, and then, throwing aside the black cassock of the clergyman, stood revealed in all the panoply of a soldier of the American Army and demanded that those men who were loyal to the cause of the Revolution should follow him from the church to the field. [Applause.] He led from that building more than 300 of the staunch, sturdy Germans, members of that Lutheran congregation, and from that day to this citizens of German birth have needed no defense, and need none now.

It is the glory of this country that, coming from every race stock as we do, we have agreed so well, we have progressed so well, that we have differed so little. It is worthy of note, even by the newspapers of the city of New York, that amid all the toil, tribulation, and trouble and rumors of war that come to us from Europe, our five million from all races of stock continue to dwell and do business together, untroubled by the fact, so far as their relations one to the other are concerned, that across the water their kinfolks are engaged in a desperate, deadly struggle. We have with us a united people; and it is therefore the more regrettable that people in high position, first, the President of the United States, and then the gentleman from Massachusetts, following a bad example, should do anything to segregate us. From the first we have had in the city to which the President is going a desire to welcome the stranger of other faith. In 1657, when New York was a Dutch province and partly settled by English, it is to the honor of those English that when the Quakers, the members of the Society of Friends, came into the province and established a church a demand was made upon the governor that he should prosecute them. The sturdy English citizens inaugurated a practice by sending a memorial to the governor, in which they said:

* * * Neither stretch out our hands against them to punish, banish, or persecute them. * * * That which is of God will stand, and that which is of man will come to nothing. * * * Therefore, if any of these said persons come in love unto us, we can not in conscience lay violent hands upon them, but give them free egress and regress into our towns and houses. * * * This is according to the patent and charter of our town * * * which we are not willing to infringe or violate.

Thirty-one of these men stood to that document until their lands were forfeited rather than violate that early principle of the island of Manhattan. As we commenced, so we have gone on, as our President ought to know, in that mutual living together in comprehension, in forbearance, and training our young to have an absolute loyalty to the American Government.

I do not know the custom of other cities, and other cities do not know ours, but I want those here to know that at least once a week in every public school in the city of New York—and we have 700,000 children in our public schools—every boy and every girl is brought together in one big room, the American flag—our beautiful flag—is brought in with ceremony, and all rise and salute, and they say something like this: "I pledge adherence to my flag [applause] and to the country for which it stands, a Nation one and indivisible." [Applause.] It is that training from the earliest day which has laid the foundation for the loyal American patriotism which the President of the United States will find in the city of New York.

Now, was there dissatisfaction as to the President's speech here and to the speech made at the Manhattan Club? Certainly. Is there disloyalty? Not at all. I represent upon this floor next to the largest Democratic district in the city of New York. I think my friend BRUCKNER has a larger Democratic district than I have, but the Democratic majority over the Republican vote in the twenty-third congressional district was, according to the enrollment at the special election at which I was elected, nearly 13,000. I have a right to say some things from his fellow Democrats to our Democratic President.

Why was this overturn? On my personal merit? It would be both immodest and untruthful in me to make that assertion. Entirely on account of the tariff? I should like to be able to say that, but it would be inaccurate. Gentlemen like Mr. CAMPBELL and Mr. LONGWORTH, who came there and spoke on the tariff, contributed thousands of votes to me on election day; but that great district, more than 80 per cent of which is either foreign born or, like the President, children of parents one or both of whom is foreign born, voted for me because I made a campaign on the platform of an adequate national defense. [Applause.] If there is one voter of German birth and parentage in the congressional district, there are twelve thousand of them, and my reiterated speech in that campaign was that, if I was elected, I would come here as an American, to represent an American district in an American Congress; and I would not dare to go back to the twenty-third district, foreign born as it is, unless I so represented an American district in an American Congress. [Applause.]

Are our fellow citizens of German birth satisfied? No. What is it they demand? Simply that there shall be a uniform American policy adopted by the administration and enforced against all nations alike. Are they distressed when our Nation demands reparation for the death of our citizens? No; but they are distressed when they detect or think they detect in the administration of our laws a partiality as between nations. I do not agree with my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] that the great battle of democracy is being fought by Great Britain. The great battle of democracy and of progressive government is being fought now as for a hundred years in the United States of America. [Applause.] It is here that the present hope of the best government is, and it is here that our efforts should be devoted toward perfecting that government. Our fellow citizens of German birth note the sternness of the notes that went to Germany and they call upon us to note that as between the central powers and ourselves a solution of those problems is being reached, which bids fair to be creditable to both sides; but they also call upon us to note that there is no "strict accountability" note going to Great Britain, and they demand as Americans that we perfect an American policy and stand by it as against the whole of the world or any portion of it.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BENNET. How much time have I?

The SPEAKER. Four minutes.

Mr. BENNET. I will yield for a question.

Mr. GARDNER. Does the gentleman know of any German-American newspaper that denounced the sinking of the Lusitania?

Mr. BENNET. As I do not read German I can not say they did or did not. I am not defending that act, and my friend, with his excellent knowledge of English, I think understands my position correctly. What our citizens of German birth or extraction do protest against is the fact that we seem to be sinking into the position of a dependency or territory of Great Britain. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], if he is logical, holds that view, because he says that during the progress of the war we ought not to interfere with the violations of neutrality laws on the part of Britain. If we decline to interfere, then we become an ally of Great Britain, and if we are going to be an ally of Great Britain, let us have the old-fashioned American sturdiness and take the disadvantages with the advantages. If the gentleman wants us to be an ally of Great Britain, and if this House thinks that way—which I do not believe—let him introduce his resolution so that the American people can at least have the courage of Japan and not be in the present position of Greece. Do I overstate our position? Let me give one or two illustrations. A citizen of New York City, a diamond merchant, with an office for more than 20 years in Amsterdam and an office for more than 30 years in New York, desired to send $300,000 in gold on a neutral steamer from himself in New York to himself in Amsterdam to pay his own bills and was not permitted to do so by the British Government, although the shipment was on a neutral ship. A constituent of mine who earned every dollar that he made shipped $15,000 worth of furs to a Scandinavian country, to a neutral port on a neutral ship, from a neutral country, from an American citizen to, I think, a Danish subject, and they were seized and taken into Kirkwall, together with, I think, as I recollect it, something like 400 ships since the beginning of the war, in absolute violation of international law, both American and British.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was quite correct. If we ever get into any contest, which God forbid, we stand a far greater chance, with these daily recurring instances of high-handed oppression to our citizens and our commerce, of getting into trouble with Great Britain than with Germany. For one I hope that we will get into trouble with neither, and I hope that the views of the President and those who think with him will prevail for preparedness, but beyond that and above that I most sincerely trust that the advisers of the President and the President himself, sympathizing as he must with persons of recent foreign birth, will recognize the necessity of removing the causes of irritation and uniting our people, whether of native or foreign birth, not on any policy of aggression, not into any speculation, but behind and upon an American policy for an American people, administered by an American Government. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 25 minutes at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to address the House for 25 minutes at the present time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Mr. Speaker, a very gratifying spectacle has been witnessed in this House this morning. When the people of the entire country are more or less excited in anticipation of some trouble that might possibly arise to see the East and the West, the North and the South, here standing as one man, as one country, having the interest of the country and its general welfare uppermost in heart, is a spectacle that the country ought to be and is proud of.

Mr. Speaker, let me assure the Members of this House that I sincerely appreciate this allotment of time to me, that I may submit some views I entertain in the presence of this, the greatest lawmaking body in the world—a great privilege and honor to any man—and I promise not to abuse that generous consideration or cause you to regret having extended to me this opportunity to, in my humble way, speak to you and through you to my people at home and the good people all over the land—the country of my birth and the country in which it is an honor and great privilege to live and to labor for those whom you love and those dependent upon you. I love my country and all the good people therein. I stand for one God, one country, and one flag. That flag floating out yonder in the crisp breeze represents the highest ideals of citizenship, forbearance, stability, and integrity, and a country where the word of God is the word of its people; where Christianity, which links humanity to God, is fully honored by a noble race of people, whose motto is: "Peace on earth, good will toward men."

We are living in a fast age and during stirring times. Nearly one-half of the population of the world is engaged in killing one another and destroying their neighbors' property, burning the homes of defenseless women and children during the absence in war of the heads of the families; old and indigent people, men and women and little children are starving to death and falling by the wayside to arise no more as flies in the autumn. Public buildings, historic palaces, railroads, bridges, stock, feed, barns, homes, and other property of at least ten nations of the earth are going up in smoke, leaving ruined countries, sick and starving people to fall and die away from their homes among strangers and in strange lands as the result of a cruel, wanton war.

In addition, nearly 10,000,000 soldiers have been destroyed—killed or crippled. Thousands of young men have kissed their parents, brothers, and sisters good-bye and have gone to the front—never to return. A cruel war of conquest, brought on by the rich and powerful, who usually stay out of range, while the poor men of moderate means are at the front doing the fighting and butchering. Great God, what a spectacle! Why, oh why, should the rich and powerful of my country want to involve our country in war? The monarchs of Europe brought on the present world's greatest war. The flower and manhood of that unhappy and desolate country is lying in unmarked tombs. The pride and hopes of those left behind are gone forever, as never again will husband and wife, father and child embrace each other as of yore. No, never; not this side of eternity.

The newspapers, especially those subsidized, are inflaming the public mind of our people. Some of them, and unscrupulous politicians, men who do not love this country and its great traditions, are sinning against the dignity and usefulness of their own Nation. Some of them are engaged in slandering our own great, honest, Christian President, Woodrow Wilson, maligning the President of their great country and mine, trying to embarrass the great chieftain of my country and theirs. But God is with him. He has kept the faith and preserved the command written in that great good book of all books, the Bible, which says, "Thou shalt not kill!"

The great rank and file of the good people of this Republic are with and behind you, President Wilson! The wives and mothers of this Republic are praying to God to give you wisdom and strength of character to stand firm as you are for peace and tranquillity in our land. They have reared their boys to love and cherish high ideals in order to engage in the various avocations of usefulness in life, and not to kill.

When I was a child the ravages of the War between the States destroyed the savings of a lifetime of my father and mother. When the war was over all was lost. Father and brother gone; nothing left; a careworn, widowed mother—God bless her memory—with seven orphan children, in poverty and rags, to struggle for a miserable existence. I know what war means, especially to women and children. I know in fact the misery and woe left in its wake, and I stand here to-day an advocate of peace. I believe in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. That is what our Constitution means; that is what that flag, the symbol of this Nation, represents.

It is charged that war on the German Empire should have been declared. What unfriendly act toward these United States was Germany ever before this war guilty of, except in her struggle with the combined forces of a great adversary? Why do not our people stay out of range? If two men are fighting with knives or pistols, an innocent bystander, or even a peacemaker, is often killed. We have been worse treated by England than Germany. England wrapped her ship in the American flag in order to deceive hostile countries and adversaries. Our ships have been sunk and the lives of our people destroyed by going into the range in which we have been warned not to go.

These things occurred at a time of great excitement of our neighbors, and we should be forbearing and tolerant, even more so than at any other time. Our worst enemies are at home. Men who, to enrich themselves and reap fabulous fortunes at the price of the dead and dying, the lame and the weak, would plunge our beloved country into war, with all its horrors, and involve us in a $10,000,000,000 war debt, all for the sake of greed and avarice.

I am for preparedness upon a reasonable and essential plan. Not for aggression but for defensive purposes only. My country's good, my country's progress among the nations of the earth, my country's standing before the world for peace are all higher and more sacred to me than my politics. Where is the true man who would not sacrifice his all for the good of his country—for the uplift and peace of his fellow man? If there be such a selfish man, let him stand before the great bar of public opinion and be subjected to the gaze of honest, patriotic men, and his leopard spots will quickly develop. Show me a man who can stand the insults, the gibes, and the slander, coming from a great horde of interested sources, uncomplainingly and meekly, that his country may live and prosper and exert an elevating influence for peace and Christianity after he has gone to his final reward, beyond the mystic river of time, and I will show you Woodrow Wilson. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It takes an iron-nerved man of a high and lofty purpose to withstand the slander being heaped upon our President by those so powerful in the financial world, wanting war, in order to double and triple and quadruple their already stupendous fortunes at the expense of the lives of the young men of our country.

Did I raise my boy and did you raise your boys to kill people? We reared them to live lives of Christians. But it is urged by the fighters that when a German submarine torpedoed and sank an American ship and caused the death of so many American citizens, that then and there diplomatic relations should have been severed and war declared upon that unhappy country from whence so many of our best citizens come and have prospered here among us, and where they are respected according to their conduct, the same as any other American citizens.

Mind you, this desperate war was going on on land and sea. The steamship companies were exacting desperately high freight and passenger rates, and for one trip through the war zone some paid likely as much as three trips in times of peace. The people knew the risk they were running. They took the risk and lost. So did the steamship company. Germany has admitted the submarine captain's mistake, and practically disavowed the act, and has agreed to pay the bill. It is true those precious lives can never be restored, but why go into the war zone? Why undertake to pass through it in the time of cruel warfare? Would any man on land undertake to pass between two men shooting at each other? Nor did Germany's submarine captain know but what that vessel was really an English vessel.

How about England? Her course has been disastrous to our commerce on the sea. She seized cotton from the South and was the principal agency which caused the loss, we are told by that splendid and noble Member of the House, Mr. HEFLIN, of Alabama, to the South of $400,000,000; and but for Secretary McAdoo, one of the greatest Secretaries since Stanton, the Southland, God bless her, would have been nearly bankrupt. But do not you fear! That southern pride, thrift, and chivalry will again come into her own.

What did Germany do, except during the time of this war, to hurt our country?

What has England ever done for our country that she should have done, except to use us? We have seen the hidden mystery, the writing on the walls of the old Capitol Building of this Nation, and even in the Speaker's chair, where one of her boisterous cavaliers once stood. There and then and other places at other times in history of the past you will find the answer.

Now, finally, we are all—the Members of this House and Senate and the President—styled traitors by certain yellow journals because we do not send an army into Mexico, take charge of and run the Government of that bleeding and almost destroyed Republic. The 17 men who were recently so cruelly, cowardly, and ruthlessly massacred in Mexico had been notified not to go into it; that it was not safe; that guerrilla bands were abroad; but they took the chance and lost all. I have no doubt it was done to bring on a conflict between the United States and the de facto government of Carranza, and by the Villa adherents, and perhaps by his advice and counsel, and I believe time will prove that others, closer home, were connected with the plot.

What has Carranza done? Here I insert his reply to our demands that the murderers be punished—put to death. He answered immediately through the accredited representative of the United States in that country, and here it is:

CARRANZA APPEALS TO AMERICAN PUBLIC—LAWLESSNESS IN BEST OF STATES MAY CAUSE LOSS OF LIFE—POINTS TO HIS DIFFICULTY—RAILROAD BESET BY BANDITS LONG AND WIDE AND HARD TO GUARD—OUTRAGE IS TO BE AVENGED—NONE, HE SAYS, CAN LAMENT KILLING OF AMERICANS MORE THAN HE—BELIEVES IT WAS DONE TO PROVOKE INTERNATIONAL TROUBLE—PERPETRATORS OF DEED OUTSIDE THE LAW TO BE PUNISHED BY DEATH—DELAY IN REPORT TO SENATE OF STATE DEPARTMENT DRAWS CRITICISM FROM FALL.

The State Department received last night Gen. Carranza's reply to its request that the murderers of the 17 Americans near Santa Ysabel be captured and punished. It came in the form of the following dispatch from Consul John R. Silliman:

QUERETARO, MEXICO, January 16.

SECRETARY OF STATE, Washington:

Department's telegram of January 13, 5 p. m., massacre Americans at Santa Ysabel, received at 8.20 and immediately placed before Gen. Carranza by me in person. Gen. Carranza said that he had already issued orders for the immediate pursuit, capture, and punishment of those responsible for the atrocity. He stated that he believed this outrage was committed by men associated directly with Villa, and that it was done specially to provoke international trouble at this time. He said he had declared those responsible outside the law, to be punished with death if caught.

APPEALS FOR CONSIDERATION.

He appeals to the Secretary of State and to the public of the United States to consider the wide strip of the Central Railway, the great difficulty of guarding the entire distance, and the comparatively easy task of destroying a train or attacking a small place. He says that nobody can lament more than he such an atrocity or be more concerned about it, but that protection is relative and that even in the best regulated state outbursts of disorders and lawlessness may cause destruction of property and loss of life. He says he is expecting full reports from Gen. Trevino, and that all efforts will be made to protect Americans and any other foreigners who may be in the district. His belief is the massacre was made premeditatedly by a band, who fled at once after the raid.

SILLIMAN.

CARRANZA AUTHORIZES "ANY CITIZENS" TO KILL SLAYERS OF AMERICANS.

LAREDO, TEX., January 16.

Gen. Venustiano Carranza, as head of the de facto Mexican government, has issued an order authorizing "any citizens" to put to death bandits implicated in the killing of American mining men at Cusihuiriachio, according to a dispatch to-night from Queretaro. The dispatch also reported that Gen. Carranza to-day transferred his headquarters from Queretaro to Celeva.

"The act of a citizen in killing any of the participants in killing of foreigners at Cusihuiriachio would be considered an act of patriotism, and not of crime," Gen. Carranza is quoted as saying.

"Should the bandits cross the American border I trust they will be captured and returned to Mexico for execution."

Since the publication of this information throughout the United States, the leading newspapers of our country are now publishing the following information under date of January 23, 1916, which I quote as follows:

MEXICANS WHO SHOT AKERS HEAP CURSES ON AMERICANS AS DEATH VOLLEY IS FIRED—DURAN BROTHERS DEFIANT AS THEY GO TO EXECUTION IN WEIRD JUAREZ CEMETERY—ELDER DECLARES HE ALONE KILLED AMERICAN RANCHMAN TO PROTECT HOME—REFUSE TO BE BLINDFOLDED—MANY WOMEN SPECTATORS.

EL PASO, TEX., January 23.

With a curse upon their lips against the American people, two young Mexicans, brothers, were shot to death by a Carranza firing squad in the Juarez cemetery at 6.07 this morning for the murder on Friday afternoon of Bert L. Akers, an American rancher, of Ysleta, Tex., while 50 Americans, including a number of women, looked on. Bernardo and Federico Duran, the executed men, went to their death standing shoulder to shoulder against the whitewashed adobe wall of the cemetery. They faced the firing squad with undaunted bravery, refused to be blindfolded, and fell together at the first volley.

Almost their last word was this challenge, flung at the small group of American newspaper men and friends of the murdered Akers:

"Watch and see how Mexicans die, you Americans——"

KILLED TO PROTECT HOME.

The only plea of any sort was made by Bernardo Duran, the elder brother, a few minutes before the end. Standing beside the cemetery gate, he said, in his own tongue, to a correspondent, the only American who talked to the prisoners:

"We are dying for you Americans. Tell the world that. I shot the American because he was trying to force entrance to my home. I was defending my rights, as any man would have done.

"My brother here is entirely innocent. He didn't fire a shot, but they are going to kill him, too. Tell me, is that justice? He is being sacrificed to your American public opinion. We are not afraid to die, but why should an innocent man be killed? He is only 22 years old. I am 24. Some day we will be avenged."

WEIRD MARCH TO DEATH.

While the elder talked the younger brother stood beside him, hands pocketed and lips quivering slightly, but saying nothing. The prisoners were bound together by ropes.

The Juarez cemetery is a mile and a half from the jail where the condemned men spent their last night.

The morning air was cold, but they wore no coats when they emerged at 5.30 a. m. from the prison and took their place between six silent guards and set out afoot for the place of death. Beside the firing squad rode its commander, Capt. Alfredo Ortiz. With heads bent, the brothers strode along talking softly to each other. The guards, muffled in gaudy-colored blankets, shuffled beside them. Once or twice the elder brother's arm went caressingly over the younger's shoulder and he whispered a word of comfort.

The road to the cemetery is a gloomy one, even by day. It leads over a plain dotted with sickly mesquite and cactus. The last half mile before the cemetery gate the road straightens out and the white crosses are visible long before the gate is reached.

PASS THROUGH FATAL GATE.

Neglect has made the burying ground even more desolate than usual. The crosses stand awry over many graves. Few are erect. Standing thus at grotesque angles, they make weird shadows on the weed-covered turf and marble slabs.

Slowly the little procession approached the gate, which stands at the crest of a gentle rise.

Through that gate have gone hundreds of prisoners sentenced to death, most of them war captives. The Americans waiting at the entrance involuntarily shrank back as the prisoners and their guards arrived at the gate, which was swung open by the deaf old sexton, who has guarded it for years. It is of iron and it creaked upon its hinges as it opened.

MARCH TO DEATH HOUSE.

"Halt!" said Capt. Ortiz when the squad had advanced about 10 feet within the cemetery. The gate was closed and the spectators leaned over it. The reporter was permitted to enter and interview the prisoners. The order to advance once more was given, and the group marched toward the "death house" in the center of the graveyard, 100 yards away.

The white walls of this one-room hut shone in the moonlight. The gate was opened to admit the witnesses, who crowded close to the executioners.

It was 6 o'clock. The church bell tolled in El Paso and reverberated over the plain. Capt. Ortiz advanced and placed a soiled handkerchief over the younger man's eyes, but as soon as the officer stepped away he slipped it to his forehead and muttered, "I will die like Bernardo, with my eyes open."

Bernardo, who had stood quietly until now, broke out into a torrent of abuse, directed at the American spectators.

"Oh, for a carbine now in my hands," he shouted. "I'd show you Americans something. Our death will not go unavenged. Ah, watch and see how Mexicans die, you Americans——"

SENDS PICTURE TO PARENTS.

A Mexican officer who had accompanied the Americans to the cemetery walked to the prisoners and said a word or two. The younger handed him a cheap little picture of himself and asked that it be sent to his parents in Santa Rita, N. Mex. The elder gave him his hat as a present. The policeman embraced them both, and Bernardo said: "Por la causa" (for the cause).

The brothers spoke softly to each other as they turned and embraced.

"Ready!" said the captain.

"Take aim!"

Church bells in the ancient cathedral of Juarez began tolling to early mass.

"Fire!"

The brothers crumpled to the ground. Bernardo's arm, even in his death agony, lay across his brother's breast as though trying to protect him. A groan came from the writhing figure of the elder. With his dying breath he said clearly, "Oh, God, wait a minute."

Capt. Ortiz drew his revolver and advanced to the fallen men. Quickly he sent a bullet into the brain of each—the mercy shot.

The bodies were displayed to-day in Juarez, and several hundred friends of the murdered American viewed them.

This was indeed a pathetic case, well calculated to arouse both admiration and deep sorrow, but it shows President Carranza's determination to protect the lives and property of Americans in Mexico at whatever cost to his people, and that he is willing to make any sacrifice rather than have the United States Army and Navy invade his country. Tell me after that we ought to start upon a campaign of conquest and invasion and I reply let us first stop, look, and think.

What more could he say or do? The President has, as he should, given him a chance to make good. When the murderers are captured—and it is a big undertaking—and put to death in expiation of their horrible crime against God and his country, and the damage paid as required by international law and good conscience, what more can be expected of the new President of that wretched and disorganized country? Bear in mind war—guerrilla warfare—has been going on there for about three years.

Why do our people want to go there until conditions have righted themselves? It is the desire for greed and avarice which causes men to take chances. God pity the man or set of men who would rush our country into bloody war for the sake of private gain. We are told that it will require 275,000 soldiers, equipped with all necessary war munitions, and a part of our fleet; and the Lord only knows what the expense would be to take charge of Mexico. If we have to send the flag there, I want it to stay; but do not start it. A guerrilla war would at once ensue and would likely last 3 to 10 years, and cost our Republic possibly $7,000,000,000 to $10,000,000,000. The majority of our young men going there would never return.

I am opposed to militarism; I am opposed to our Government going on a foraging or conquest tour. We received our dose when we took the Philippines, which we can not now let loose. It is the old bear story again. Only 15 per cent of the people in these islands can read and write. They still have the tribes of head hunters there. Get rid of the islands as soon as possible and on the best possible terms, if we want to be mercenary; keep on civilizing if we want to be noble, however expensive.

My information is that the war in Europe is costing 5 of the 10 nations involved approximately $73,000,000 daily, and I here insert a clipping considered reliable. Think and ponder over it:

SEVENTY-THREE MILLION DOLLARS NOW DAILY COST OF THE WORLD WAR.

PARIS, January 16.

After prolonged study of all available statistics, Alfred Neymarck, French economist, finds that the daily cost of the war to five of the belligerents has attained $73,000,000, divided as follows:

Germany, including advances to her allies, $20,000,000; France, $16,000,000; Great Britain, $19,000,000; Russia, $13,000,000; Italy, $5,000,000.

Italy's expenses must rise to more than $6,000,000 daily, however, for by the end of July she will have spent $3,000,000,000 altogether. The belligerent war loans to the end of last October totaled $24,000,000,000, of which the United States supplied $900,000,000. The allies have borrowed $14,000,000,000 and the central empires $10,000,000,000.

If war must come, I would like if possible to see an election first held by the people, and let them vote for or against war, with the understanding that if a majority favored war, the first army should be made up of those who voted for war. If this were understood before the voting, I am sure peace would win a sweeping victory all over the land, notwithstanding the influence of the subsidized press, notwithstanding the power and influence of the money mongers abroad in the land. Oh, for another Christ to drive them this time out of the People's Chamber, that the common people can have a better chance in life! [Applause on Democratic side.]

Go and see the ministers and they will all cry out peace. Go and visit the homes of the wives and mothers of this land, and they will cry out, "Don't send our boys away to kill or be killed." Go among the farmers and listen to their story of peace. Go among the toiling people of the land, the poor people, who are expected to do the fighting, and they will all tell you that since this is to be a rich man's war, let them do their own fighting. Finally, go on the coming Sunday to the church house and there kneel down in prayer, asking God to guide you aright, and you will leave there with the cry of peace on your lips; which cry will be taken up and echoed until the clarion cry for peace and tranquillity will go up throughout the land. Let us sit steady in the boat and not be swept off our feet by interested and ulterior motives urged upon us. Our ship of state is in the balance throughout all the world. The eyes of a billion people are on us. Our own country is in a nervous state. Let us come out in the open where we can cry out to the people, "All is well along the Potomac. We are still sane in Washington." Woodrow Wilson, like the old-time religion, is good enough for me. [Applause on Democratic side.] He has piloted the ship of state through the crags and rocks of Germany, Austria, Russia, and France, and they did not touch him. He is now passing the shoals of England, and is dealing honestly and courageously with Mexico, and we are each and all behind him heart and soul and will stand or fall with him and the flag of our beloved Republic. My friends, all is well.

Cardinal Gibbons, that great and good man of whom his country is justly proud, in answering an invitation recently to address the National Conference on Immigration, is credited with sending the following answer:

> Though my official duties and increasing age prevent my doing all I should like, allow me to assure the committee of my heartiest sympathy with the work. Above all times now should our fellow citizens and compatriots be undivided in loyalty and devotion to the Stars and Stripes. May wisdom and forethought guide you and our national leaders for the best interests of our beloved country.

The exhibition of such patriotism, coming from such a high source, must give inspiration and comfort to our President and to millions of our people. We judge a tree by its fruit and a man by his love of country.

We have for the first time in my day an opportunity to grasp and take the bulk of the commerce of the world. What shall we do for our country and business men in this national emergency? Shall we be sane and patriotic or shall we pick a quarrel with some poor, oppressed, distressed, and broken-down neighbor and go to fighting? Do we want to help the business interests of this country, thereby giving employment and a higher wage to millions of our toilers? I advocate the acceptance and taking care of the wonderful volume of trade now persistently knocking at our door. In the sight of God and man, would it not be more Christianlike for us to accept the situation and be getting ready to feed and clothe these belligerent nations and sell them our products and help them rebuild their countries when this cruel war is over? A peaceful solution and avoiding war means everything to our country and people for the next 10 to 25 years. Peace means prosperity throughout our whole country. It means greater profits for our products in all lines of business and a higher wage than ever before paid in this country to our toilers.

In order to in part satisfy the demands coming from Europe now, even though the war is not ended in those ill-fated countries, our railroads are taxed beyond their capacity to handle the freight offered to them for transportation from the interior of our country to the seacoast. There is now afforded almost continuous employment at a better wage to the coal miners of this country than they have ever heretofore enjoyed. It has increased the price of coal from about 70 cents run of mine to $1.40 per ton, and for the first time in many years our coal operators, who deserve so much attention and encouragement at our hands, are beginning to realize almost a reasonable profit on their business. What a glorious state of affairs, my countrymen, this is, and oh, what a shame and a pity it would be if we should prove in this House and the Senate so narrow minded as not to take advantage of a situation not created by ourselves. Our iron and steel mills are running in full blast with orders a year ahead. Our farmers are beginning to reap the harvest they have so long been entitled to and laboring for. Our toilers throughout the country are now better satisfied than they have ever been; our business men are looking upon a bright future.

These are not political matters, but business matters deserving of our serious and honest consideration. Peace will give us and our country all we want; war will nearly ruin us. Are you with your country and mine? Do you love your country and its people? Do you love our traditions and institutions? Do you love the Constitution of this Republic? Do you want to see your country and all the people therein prosper? Do you want to see them happy and contented? If so, stand as the President stands—for peace. He sees this situation, and is fighting a battle royal against desperate influences that his country and his people may by their course set an example to the world to be emulated by future generations. All this great struggle he is making is in the interest of his country's good. He is not a politician, but a patriot.

I again thank you for your attention. [Applause.]

RURAL POST ROADS.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7617

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7617, with Mr. RUCKER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> A bill (H. R. 7617) to provide that the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, shall, in certain cases, aid the States in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 2. That out of any appropriation made under the provisions of this act the Secretary of Agriculture shall deduct the sum which he shall deem necessary to defray the expenses of his department in the administration of this act and apportion the balance of said appropriation for expenditure under the provisions of this act in the several States in the following manner: $65,000 to each State, and one half of the remainder in the ratio which the population of each State bears to the population of all of the States, as shown by the latest available Federal census, and the other half of such remainder in the ratio which the mileage of rural free delivery and star mail routes in such State bears to the mileage of rural free delivery and star mail routes of all the States as shown by the latest available report of the Postmaster General.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, many gentlemen opposing this good-roads bill claim to be disturbed about "Where is the money to come from?" Some do not hesitate to say that it may interfere with the preparedness program. I consider these objections excuses and not reasons for their opposition.

Mr. Chairman, yesterday the Supreme Court of the United States declared the income tax constitutional. From that source this Government can raise many times as much money as it is now raising from the income tax as provided in the Underwood revenue bill, without burdening anyone. Mr. Chairman, I do not belong to that class of people who would say, "Lay on, Macduff." No, but I do believe that the wealthy of this country, those who have accumulated enormous fortunes, should be made to bear their legitimate share of the burdens of taxation. The Underwood revenue bill produced receipts, as follows, for the year 1915:

Customs receipts	$209,786,672.21
Internal revenue, ordinary	283,398,760.85
Corporation income tax	39,155,596.77
Individual income tax	41,046,162.09
Land sales	2,167,136.47
Miscellaneous	70,287,372.00
Total	697,910,827.58

This shows the income tax falls far short of receipts it should produce. I want it distinctly understood that I am not in favor of collecting one dollar of revenue from the stamp taxes. I think the time has come when this House should repeal the stamp taxes. [Applause.]

It has been proposed to continue indefinitely the stamp tax and to include in its provisions bank checks, notes, gasoline, and other articles included in the Spanish-American War tax. I trust my party will not call on me to vote for measures that place additional duties on checks, on notes, on gasoline, and other articles of like character. [Applause.] If we must have an emergency war tax, then let us levy duty on munitions of war. Munition makers are reaping unheard-of profits, then let those benefiting by the war in Europe bear this burden while others are suffering from the sudden outburst of this most horrible war of all times. [Applause.] Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to show you another source from which the revenue of this Government can be raised instead of stamp tax. The Constitution of the United States specifically provides that the Government may lay and collect taxes on imports, tariff duties, and refuses to delegate this right to the several States, thus recognizing this as the principal source of revenue for the General Government.

Furthermore, this method of collecting tax has been the cornerstone of the Democratic Party. Three times the Democratic Party has been the dominant party since the Civil War, and each time declared for revenue tariff. The platform of 1884 reads as follows:

From the foundation of the Government taxes collected at the customhouse have been the chief source of the Federal revenue.

Upon that platform the Democratic Party won. [Applause.]

In 1892 the Democratic Party declared:

We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government has no constitutional power to impose and collect tariff duties, except for the purposes of revenue only, and we demand that the collection of such taxes shall be limited to the necessities of the Government when honestly and economically administered.

Upon that platform in 1892 the Democratic Party again won.

In 1912 the Democratic Party took the exact language of the platform in 1892 in regard to the collection of the taxes of the Government by tariff duties for revenue purposes only, and upon that platform in 1912 the Democratic Party again won.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Democratic Party has won three times since the Civil War on the platforms I have just read. Then, Mr. Chairman, I contend that Democrats are following the landmarks of our fathers when duties are levied on imports for revenue, and I fail to find any precedents for a stamp tax.

Mr. Chairman, in 1900 the Democratic Party went after a strange god in its platform, and no mention was made of collecting customs duties on imported goods for Government revenue.

Mr. SLOAN. That was the exception?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I will answer the gentleman by saying this is my personal opinion; I did not say this critically, and my observation is the gentleman's own party—the Republican Party—has also made mistakes. I think the Democratic Party made a mistake when it made this declaration:

The burning issue of imperialism is regarded as the paramount issue in this campaign.

That is an important question, but not paramount.

Mr. Chairman, this stamp tax was imposed upon the people at a time when it looked as if it were absolutely necessary to collect more duties in some way. It was said that the tariff could not be revised at that time quickly enough for the purpose of getting the revenue. The Democratic Party considered it wise not to expect much revenue from the income tax, for the reason that the Supreme Court might declare the act unconstitutional; but now why not immediately increase its capacity as a revenue producer and at the same time revise other sections of the tariff bill on luxuries for the purpose of raising revenue?

Mr. Chairman, at this time there is no war in this country; normal conditions are returning. It is true we face a condition now caused by the European war demanding additional legislation for revenue purposes, but let us not depart from the landmarks of successful tax laws. The Underwood-Wilson tariff bill would have produced enough revenue under ordinary circumstances. We confront extraordinary conditions. On account of the European war there has been considerable reduction of imports from foreign markets and consequently less duty levied, making a deficit in our revenues. There would have been ample revenue collected at the customhouses from imported goods if we had had normal conditions, but I contend this condition should be remedied by increase of income tax, customs duties, munitions of war duties, or some other method, not stamp tax on articles of common use, annoying everybody. [Applause.] Should additional duties be placed on certain imports to meet this present emergency, when the emergency passes away then the duties can be restored as now provided in the Underwood revenue bill.

Mr. SLEMP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I yield.

Mr. SLEMP. Will the gentleman from Georgia give a list of the articles on which he desires to have the tariff restored?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared to give a list of the articles on which the tariff should be raised. It may not be necessary to increase any custom duties when the income tax is properly revised and duty levied on munitions of war, but should it be necessary, only a few luxuries will meet fully the demand.

Mr. SLEMP. I just wanted to have the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I know the gentleman is in good faith in his inquiry. Mr. Chairman, there are three items I can furnish, and first of all I would say an increase of income tax, and if that does not produce a sufficient amount, if we are going to resort to stamp taxes, then, second, place duties on munitions of war; third, tariff duties on luxuries. I repeat, we are not engaged in war justifying continuation of the stamp tax and enlarging its provisions. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this Congress should pass the good-roads bill now before the House. We must also pass a rural-credit bill with Government aid. Furthermore, we should also pass a merchant-marine bill. When the war began American vessels carried 8 per cent of our products to foreign countries. Of course, the merchant vessels of the warring countries were required for war purposes, thus giving the ships left on the ocean for transportation purposes a monopoly. Before the war cotton was shipped from Galveston to Liverpool for $1.10 per bale; after the war it has been costing $17.50 from Galveston to Liverpool per bale. Since I have been in Congress I have been contending that the Government should so construct auxiliary vessels for the Navy that they may be used for commercial purposes in time of peace. During the consideration of the last Navy bill I succeeded in cutting out of the bill on the floor of the House transports and hospital ships, over the protest of the other members of the committee, saving $4,500,000. These auxiliaries are not needed in time of peace and are purchased for temporary purposes in time of war. I am willing to vote for this class of vessels if the Government will use them as merchant vessels in time of peace. Should war come, such auxiliary vessels as scouts, transports, mine layers, fuel ships, hospital ships, supply ships, and ammunition ships could be secured instantly from the merchant vessels used by the Government for commercial purposes in time of peace. Annually we are spending millions for these small war vessels in the Navy. Why not put them and their crews to work in time of peace? That is the kind of merchant marine I favor, and if this Congress will adopt it the products of this country will be transported to foreign markets at reasonable rates and no longer will the transportation of a bale of cotton to foreign markets cost $17.50 per bale.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is recognized.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it affords me great pleasure to see and note even a partial conversion of one of our Democratic friends.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. What is the amendment to which the gentleman is speaking?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am speaking to the amendment of the gentleman to strike out the last word. I am speaking in opposition to it.

I fear the gentlemen on the other side, from the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE], who has last spoken, and the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] yesterday, do not fully understand the condition of the Treasury. The gentleman who has just spoken says he would repeal the stamp tax. He is not in favor of it. Does the gentleman know that if that act was not put in force we would have a deficit, according to the statement of the President in his message, of about $84,000,000 for this fiscal year. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] yesterday spoke about surplus and deficit, in the inquiry he made of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. Apparently he understood that the surplus referred to the amount in the Treasury——

Mr. GORDON. Let us hear your definition of it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not look at me in that alarming manner. He overawes me by his awful presence. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, we have continued the stamp taxes for the rest of the year, but even that is not sufficient. We still will have a deficit of about $43,000,000 with it continued to the end of the fiscal year. With the continuance of the sugar tax there will be still a deficit of something like $28,000,000 for this year.

In speaking of deficits we mean the difference, the amount which our revenues are less than the amount of our expenditures. When we have a surplus, as we usually have under a Republican administration, we mean the amount which the revenues exceed the expenditures.

Now, the gentleman says that he would repeal the stamp tax, take off $80,000,000, and then he would get the amount necessary to make this up and what is needed for other expenditures, which were not referred to by the President, by levying a supertax on incomes, which he estimates, as I understand, would produce $100,000,000 to $200,000,000. But that would not be sufficient. He would have to have some further method of raising revenue besides that if we are to have expenditures like these, with the condition of the Treasury as it is to-day. On yesterday, when there was an inquiry about it by the gentleman from Ohio, the balance in the Treasury, excluding the amount subject to the check of the disbursing officers, was about $50,000,000. The first of last June the balance had run down to $15,000,000, according to the daily statement at that time. Upon the basis which is now estimated we should, of course, add the amount which was in the fund for the redemption of national-bank notes. But even then it is apparent that we should reach the same condition or worse this year, and that we shall be doing as we did last year—carrying on the Treasury by paying the bills out of trust funds that are under the control of the department.

The President of the United States recommended—and very properly—that we ought to have an amount of at least $50,000,000 in the way of a net balance in the Treasury. How are we going to get it? By these indefinite suggestions made by the gentleman from Georgia? Nothing in that line will produce it. By raising the duty on some particular article? The establishment of a new duty on dyestuffs, for example, will not help us. I understand that is likely to be brought before the House soon. What we need—and the only thing that will bring us back to a point where we will have a free balance in the Treasury—is a Republican tariff, administered and prepared upon protective principles. And we also need an economy that has not been visible so far. There seems to be a tendency on the part of some Members—and it is not confined entirely to one side of the House—to vote for every appropriation, but a great reluctance to levy any tax to pay it. But taxes must come, and they will be increased if this bill passes in its present form and no different methods are devised for additional revenue. This is especially true if we are to carry out the program indicated in the President's message and add thereby two or three hundred million dollars of additional expenditure.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], the chairman of the committee, rise?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I wanted to make a request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Let us see how many amendments there are.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I want to see how much time we can devote to this section and amendments.

Mr. MANN. We would like 20 minutes on the section and amendments.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time for discussion of this section and amendments thereto be limited to 25 minutes, 5 minutes to be controlled by me and 20 minutes by the gentleman on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed in 25 minutes, 20 minutes of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and 5 minutes by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 19, after the word "general," insert the following: "Provided, That no portion of this appropriation shall be used in the construction, maintenance, or repair of all toll roads."

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it necessary to discuss the amendment. It really speaks for itself. None of this money should be used on toll roads.

I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back four minutes and a half. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR].

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, let us have that reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 2, line 8, after the word "act," insert "not exceeding $750,000."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to place some limit upon the amount that can be deducted and set aside by the Secretary of Agriculture for the expenses of his department in construing this act.

This is a new proposition, and it will offer a fertile field to any department head so inclined to construct a department made up of political henchmen and to have road inspectors installed in office in each of the 48 States of this Union. I am satisfied that the great majority of the people in certain sections of this Union are pretty hungry for Federal funds, if the opinions as voiced by their Representatives here on the floor are any criterion of their desires, so that we ought to limit the opportunity offered by this bill for the appointment of a great army of Federal officials, and we ought to say, as was said in the bill offered last year and in the Sixty-second Congress, that there shall not be expended more than a reasonable sum in the expenses of the Department of Agriculture. I think in one bill the amount set out is $880,000, and I submit that $750,000 will be ample for the department to use in passing upon these plans and in making up its mind whether these roads for which is sought Federal aid are projects worthy of funds from the Federal Treasury.

I ask that this amendment be adopted; and I wish to state here that I have another amendment to this section which I desire to offer at the proper time.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts yields back two minutes. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I did not catch the exact language of that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment again.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SLOAN: Page 2, line 7, after the word "sum," strike out the words "which he shall deem necessary" and insert the words "which shall be appropriated by Congress following estimates submitted by."

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is akin to the amendment just voted upon.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment I have presented is akin to the amendment just voted upon, upon which there was a very close vote.

The purpose of it, as those in charge of the bill will see, is to require that the Secretary of Agriculture, in performing this new piece of work that is delegated to him, shall be controlled in the same manner as he is controlled in any other public project which it becomes his duty as Secretary of Agriculture to execute or to have charge. In every appropriation bill that comes into this House the first thing arranged for is the salary for the head of the department, and the next is the allowance of salaries of those whom he desires to select for his assistants. There is no reason on earth that I can conceive why the Secretary of Agriculture should be given the discretion of spending at his own whim or will one dollar out of the $25,000,000 or all of that $25,000,000 for purely administrative purposes. There is nowhere indicated in this bill where he is denied that discretion. All I ask is that instead of leaving it to the arbitrary discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture it shall be submitted to the usual appropriating committee of this House, and then that appropriating committee will lay out what ought to be of the $25,000,000 a year for administration of roads. That will be separated and given first to the head of the bureau, if one be established, and next to the number of employees that may be allowed. So that any purpose a Secretary might have of making a political machine out of this work would be thwarted. It is so attempted to be thwarted in every other department of the governmental activities. I think that the committee ought to agree to this. The suggestion should be enough to have this allowed.

Think of the discretion allowed by this bill in its present form. The Secretary who obtains his position without the direct vote of anybody, is given a war-lord's control of a chest of $25,000,000. Of this vast sum he may use all or most of it for administering the road project, giving practically none of it or some of it for actual construction. He may employ 1 or 10,000 men in and out of Washington to do whatever he sees fit, these men with or without qualifications for any practical work. Further, he can deal with the State highway department almost as he sees fit.

While it is not expected that a Secretary would so abuse his privilege and the discretion conferred upon him, yet legislation should be framed so as to prevent such abuse instead of permitting it.

All the foregoing within the Secretary's discretion—discretion—that realm throughout which choice and will are unrestrained; where duty often waits upon ambition; when mild, unpenalized vice supplants virtue; where good may be but evil is liable to occur; where weakness waivers, strength sleeps, and where expedience outranks right. It is a domain always sought to be extended by its occupant and against which extension the greatest battles for human rights have been waged. Discretion is the realm of the monarch, it is an ever-decreasing field in a Republic. Constitutions and statutes are but means of contracting their limits. The more they are contracted the more of a Republic we have. Carranza, Huerta, and Villa would rule with discretion. Americans would prefer to see them restrained by constitutions.

What I have said about administrative discretion has no peculiar application to the present distinguished Secretary of Agriculture. It could have little application to him, as every man on this side is of the firm conviction, supported by the well-grounded fear of nearly everyone on the majority side, that before this bill can become operative his successor will be installed. But whether he be Democrat or Republican the discretion conferred is too great.

I was very much pleased with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] in his frank statement that we could have plenty of money to enter upon this road-building project, and for that reason I am in favor of it. I am in favor of helping the Democrats carry out at least this one lone and somewhat yielding plank of the Democratic platform known as the good-roads plank. From what the gentleman from Georgia said I notice that in 1884 they declared for a tariff for revenue only, and the same thing in 1892, and again the same thing in 1912; but I notice, further, that after four years from 1884 they were turned out of power, and four years after 1892 they were again turned out of power, and one year from now they will be turned out of power again.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. MANN. I give the gentleman one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. SLOAN. Yes; I want to draw this conclusion, that three times in recent years the Democratic Party has come into power on its promises, and twice they have gone out on their performances; and the same thing will happen one year from now. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this amendment be read in the connection in which it occurs.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] asks unanimous consent to have read again the amendment offered. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SLOAN: Page 2, line 7, after the word "sum," strike out the words "which he shall deem necessary" and insert the words "which shall be appropriated by Congress following estimates duly submitted by him," so that the lines as amended will read:

"SEC. 2. That out of any appropriation made under the provisions of this act the Secretary of Agriculture shall deduct the sum which shall be appropriated by Congress following estimates duly submitted by him to defray the expenses of his department in the administration of this act," etc.

Mr. SAUNDERS. According to the various prophecies made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN], if he is correct, if we leave the bill as it is, a Republican Secretary will have the opportunity to build up the dreadful political machine that he is talking about. So far as we are concerned, we are willing to take the chances with that, and to leave the bill as it is.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not think the gentleman's amendment helps the bill at all, and I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been limited by an agreement.

Mr. MANN. There is an amendment pending, anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. SAUNDERS) there were—ayes 40, noes 52.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 2, line 11, after the word "manner," strike out "$65,000 to each State and"; in line 12 strike out the words "the remainder"; in lines 14 and 15, after the word "half," strike out the words "of such remainder."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, this amendment seeks to put upon some equitable basis the distribution of this fund. During the debate upon this bill several gentlemen, notably the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], asked the reason why $65,000 was given to each State of the Union; and I have not heard or read any reason offered in reply by the proponents of this legislation. They take $65,000 and give it to each State, regardless of the needs, regardless of the population, regardless of the mileage of roads, and regardless of any other consideration. In the last Congress the only reason offered for awarding that amount to the States was so that their apportionment might come up to over $100,000. I submit if that is the true reason, then the $65,000 ought to be given only to the States which, under the other terms of the apportionment, would not receive $100,000; but if the State of Nevada gets only $36,000 without this $65,000, that is no reason why the State of New York and the State of Massachusetts should also get $65,000 each. There should be some just and equitable basis for apportioning every dollar of this sum that you are seeking to appropriate here for this purpose. I say it is rank injustice to fix an arbitrary amount of $65,000 and seek to distribute that among 48 States of this Union without any consideration or without any basis upon which the apportionment of the balance of this fund is considered. So, sir, I say that if you are going to attempt to pass this legislation and enact it into law and justify yourselves by saying that every dollar of this $25,000,000 is going to be equitably dispensed and apportioned, you ought to strike out this sum as fixed in section 2 and put the whole apportionment upon the same basis.

There is no more reason for taking $65,000 than there is for taking $200,000 or $10,000, and I submit that it is fair to all the States to put them upon the same footing, and not seek to carry up the amount into six figures by an arbitrary apportionment and computation such as has been arrived at in this section. I say, put the States on an equal footing, and do not increase the share of Rhode Island by $65,000 and also increase the share of Pennsylvania by $65,000 simply in order that Rhode Island may get over $100,000, because, if it were left as the amount ought to be left, Rhode Island would get $60,000, and then she would get only what she is justly entitled to under the basis of apportionment that is fixed in this bill. If you are going to seek to split up this apportionment and take one part of the appropriation and set it aside and say, "As to this part we will distribute this as a gratuity, regardless of mileage of road, regardless of population, or regardless of anything else except giving them some money," I say, that is wrong. It is not the correct way under the principle laid down by this bill. I trust that this amendment will pass.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, this provision for the flat payment of $65,000 to each of the States, was included in the bill that passed last year. It was thoroughly discussed, and the reasons, presented in its behalf, were satisfactory to the House at that time. Now, unless we include that provision for $65,000 flat, to each State, then Nevada, Delaware, Arizona, Wyoming, Rhode Island and Utah would receive such comparatively insignificant sums under our proposed scheme of apportionment, that the amounts appropriated for their benefit respectively, would be too small to be economically overlooked by the Department of Agriculture. So we provided this flat sum of $65,000 for each of the States, and then distributed the balance of the appropriation according to the plan reported in the bill. The payment of $65,000 to each of the States has taken a negligible amount from the sums that would otherwise have been received by the larger States, but it has worked out a very equitable result. The scheme of the bill is as fair and just a plan of division, in my judgment as could be devised and a far better one than the plan proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Any plan submitted could be criticized from some point of view.

I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] one minute.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I can add nothing to the reasons stated by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] except this, that the idea of the equitable distribution of this fund that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] urges in his minority report is that the basis should be that of the rural population of a State to the total rural population of the country. Under that basis the New England States would receive much less than they receive in this bill, for the rural population of New England is 2 per cent of the entire rural population of the country. Therefore, inasmuch as no Representative from Massachusetts desires to protest against the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], which would take from his State some of the funds allotted to it under this provision, on behalf of the State of Massachusetts I protest, and I urge the equitable distribution which is provided for in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Five and one-half minutes.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the last word, and I yield my time to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read section 3 of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 3. That as soon as may be after the passage of any act making appropriations under the provisions of this act the Secretary of Agriculture shall prepare and file in his office a statement showing the amount of such appropriation he has set apart to defray the expense of his department in the administration of this act and the amount of the balance which will be available for expenditure in each State and transmit a copy of such statement to the State highway department of each State which has such a department and to the governor of each State which has not such a department; that the State highway department of any State, after receiving such statement, may apply to the Secretary of Agriculture for aid under the provisions of this act in the construction or maintenance of any rural post road in such State; and if, in his judgment, such road is one to the proposed construction or maintenance of which aid should be given under the provisions of this act, then he shall request such State highway department to furnish him with surveys, plans, specifications, and estimates of cost of said proposed construction or maintenance and any other information which he may consider proper; that he shall examine said surveys, plans, specifications, and estimates of cost and determine what would be the reasonable cost of such construction or maintenance and what amount of aid will be given under the provisions of this act to such proposed construction or maintenance, which shall in no case be less than 30 nor more than 50 per cent of what he has so determined would be the reasonable cost of such proposed construction or maintenance, and shall forthwith transmit to said State highway department a written statement of his said determinations; that upon receipt of such written statement the said State highway department may transmit to the Secretary of Agriculture a statement in writing notifying him that such proposed construction or maintenance will be undertaken upon the terms proposed; that thereupon the proper authorities of the State may, in accordance with the laws of such State, commence and prosecute said construction or maintenance in substantial compliance with said surveys, plans, and specifications; that when the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that said construction or maintenance of said road has been finished in substantial compliance with said surveys, plans, and specifications he shall cause to be paid to the proper authority of said State whatever remains unpaid of the amount which he has stated, as hereinbefore provided, would be given to aid said State in said proposed construction or maintenance of said road; that the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, from time to time make payments upon such construction or maintenance as the same progresses, but these payments, including previous payments, if any, shall in no case be more than the pro rata part of the United States of the value of labor and materials which have been put into such construction or maintenance.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to the language on page 3, line 7, where it says—may apply to the Secretary of Agriculture for aid, under the provisions of this act, in the construction or maintenance of any rural post road in such State.

It occurs to me that you have omitted the most important thing that you and all desire who favor the passage of this legislation. It is not only the construction, which means the original building of the road, and the maintenance and continuation of the road, but it is doubtless intended that most of the money that is appropriated under the terms of this act, if it shall pass, ought to be, and will be, appropriated for the improvement of existing highways; and therefore it occurs to me that the word "improvement" ought to be inserted after the word "construction."

Mr. SAUNDERS. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will say to the gentleman that, so far as the committee is concerned, we are willing that the word "improvement" should be inserted.

Mr. TOWNER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to another matter. Immediately following that, in the next sentence, it says—and if, in his judgment, such road is one to the proposed construction or maintenance of which aid should be given under the provisions of this act, then he shall—

So-and-so.

I think I understand what was the purpose of that language, but I greatly fear that it will not carry out the purpose of it. As the language reads, in my judgment, it will leave entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture whether or not he will grant to any form of road which he may favor or refuse to grant to any road that he does not favor, because the qualifying words, interpreted grammatically, might be held to apply only to the clause that immediately precedes it and refer to aid under the provisions of this act.

I take it that is not the intention of the committee or those friendly to this bill. I think it is the purpose of the committee and those who favor this legislation that if at any time it is shown that any road shall fairly come under the provisions of this act, then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to do what the provisions of this act provide. I suggest language something like this, that instead of this language they should say, "and if the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that such construction, improvement, or maintenance is fairly under the provisions of this act, then," and so forth.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. How does the gentleman's language differ from that employed in the bill?

Mr. TOWNER. Very materially, because under the language that I propose the Secretary of Agriculture could determine whether or not it fairly came under the provisions of this act.

Mr. BORLAND. That is what must be determined under this act.

Mr. TOWNER. I think not; the language is very broad, which says, "if in his judgment said road is one where aid should be given"——

Mr. BORLAND. Under the provisions of this act.

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly; but as I said before, that qualifying phrase, as the Secretary of Agriculture might interpret it, might be held to allow him to refuse aid to any form of road which he might not approve. It occurs to me that the language is indefinite. I think we want this appropriation to be made under the terms of this act and not leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture whether or not he will approve of it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 3, by striking out all after the word "construction," in line 7, down to and including the word "maintenance," in line 22, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Improvement or maintenance of any road in such State, and if such road shall come within the provisions of this act, then he shall request such State highway department to furnish him with surveys, plans, specifications, estimates of cost, and any other information he may consider proper. The determination of the proportion of aid to be given any project shall be left to the State highway department and shall accompany the application submitted on the part of the State. The Secretary of Agriculture shall examine said surveys, plans, specifications, and estimates of cost."

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have sent to the desk is offered on behalf of the committee. The language of the bill as reported provided that whenever there was proposed to the Secretary of Agriculture any given project, and the Secretary approved the project, he should notify the State of the amount of aid that would be given, which in no case should be less than 30 per cent nor more than 50 per cent. During the general debate criticism of that language was made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY], and one or two others upon the ground that it would place too much power in the Secretary of Agriculture. The impression prevailed that it would enable him to refrain from giving to a State the quota to which it is entitled under the language of the bill.

In my remarks in general debate I endeavored to explain that the committee in including this language in the bill intended to meet this condition. For instance, take the State of New York, where construction work to the extent of $14,000,000 was engaged in last year, according to statements made upon the floor. That State receives under this bill about $1,000,000. The State of New York may prefer to have the aid to which it is entitled under this bill distributed on a great number of roads, receiving but 30 per cent, instead of having that aid given to a few roads and receiving 50 per cent, while in the States where there is no great road fund 50 per cent will be desired. In order to meet conditions prevailing in the wealthier States, we included that language. Under no circumstances could the Secretary of Agriculture have deprived any State of one dollar of the quota to which it is entitled under the bill. Nevertheless, after consideration, I was convinced that there was much merit in the criticism of gentlemen that too much power was placed in the Secretary of Agriculture under this language if, though he could not take from a State one dollar of its quota, he could, if he desired to establish a uniform type of road, require of the State of Wisconsin, say, that it should construct a road which met with his idea of what every road in the country should be, and if the State authorities did not propose such type of road he could give to that State aid only to the extent of 30 per cent, and by using that as a weapon force them to adopt a type of road which, while it might meet with his approval, would be entirely unfit for the uses of the people of the State of Wisconsin. Therefore the amendment provides that the determination of the amount of aid shall be left to the State, so that the State can do that which the committee intended it should be entitled to do under the language of the bill as reported.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to say that not only does the gentleman's amendment do that, but it corrects both of the objections to which I referred.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. In the construction of this language the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] was considered because it occurs in the same page and same line, and we believe there is merit in that suggestion, and that the word "improvement" should be inserted, because it is difficult to tell what construction would be placed on the language as the bill was reported to the House, and as it was the intention of the committee to enable a State to participate where a road was to be rebuilt as well as where a new trail was to be blazed. We feel, therefore, that the word "improvement" ought to be included so that there can be no doubt as to the meaning of the language of the bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do not desire to have five minutes.

Mr. BORLAND. Two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman whether it was his intention in this amendment to cut out all reference to the State paying 50 per cent of the cost of construction?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No.

Mr. BORLAND. Because that is what his amendment has done, and if his amendment does not intend that, it should be redrafted.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will say that there was no such intention. The amendment was hurriedly written, and that was omitted, and I will ask to have that inserted.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If I correctly understood the amendment, it leaves out the words "rural post" before the word "roads" that is used now in the bill in line 7.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do not think it makes any difference because the first section specifies the roads on which the aid could be given.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I thought it was done to make it conform to section 1 as amended.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I think it should.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I will say that that was the reason it was left out, that it might conform to section 1 as amended.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk advises the Chair that the committee has offered a new amendment, or at least has changed the amendment. Does the gentleman desire to have that reported?

Mr. BORLAND. I think the committee asked leave to make their amendment conform to their original intent. They withdrew the amendment and offered it over again.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the committee desire to have it read again?

Mr. BORLAND. I think it ought to be reported again.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I will ask unanimous consent to have the amendment reported as it now reads.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 3, by striking out all after the word "construction," in line 7, down to and including the word "maintenance," in line 22, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Improvement or maintenance of any road in such State, and if such road shall come within the provisions of this act, then he shall request such State highway department to furnish him with surveys, plans, specifications, estimates or cost, and any other information he may consider proper. The determination of the proportion of aid to be given any project, not to exceed 50 per cent of the total cost, shall be left to the State highway department and shall accompany the application submitted on the part of the State. The Secretary of Agriculture shall examine said surveys, plans, specifications, and estimates of cost, and determine what would be the reasonable cost of such proposed improvement, construction, or maintenance."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, may I have the substitute reported?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers a substitute to the committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 8, after the word "State," strike out all of the remainder of the section and insert, in lieu thereof, the following:

"Provided, That no payment of the appropriations herein provided shall be made to any State until an equal sum has been appropriated for by the legislature of such State, or provided by State, county, local authority, or individual contributions from within the State for the construction and maintenance of the public road provided for in this act.

"That whenever any State has complied with the provisions of this act, the amount which has been apportioned to be expended in such State, which is hereby appropriated, shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the warrant of the Secretary of Agriculture out of the Treasury of the United States to the treasurer or other officers of the State duly authorized by the laws of the State to receive the same, and such officers shall be required to report to the Secretary of Agriculture a detailed statement of the amount so received and of disbursements on forms prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed by me is in line with previous legislation, and provides that States shall provide for an amount equal to the amount apportioned to the various States. It seems to me that it is safe and proper to leave the determination of the type of roads to be built to the people within the State. The people within the State have knowledge of the material available for the building of roads, the type of road required, and can better determine what type of road should be built than the Secretary of Agriculture. I simply offer it as being in line with legislation heretofore enacted, so that there may be no dispute of authority.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. I do.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is precisely what the bill and what the amendment offered on the part of the committee propose to do, to leave the original selection of the type of road to be constructed to the State authorities. The Federal Government can put a veto on it, and you can not avoid it.

Mr. HAUGEN. But under the provisions of this bill every construction must be approved by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. HAUGEN. Now comes the question——

Mr. SAUNDERS. And you can not get over that.

Mr. HAUGEN. Here comes the question. The Secretary of Agriculture—the director of roads—may determine that in our country it would be for the best interest of all concerned to construct a concrete road at an expense of five or six thousand dollars a mile——

Mr. SAUNDERS. No.

Mr. HAUGEN. And the State authorities might contend, as they do at the present time, that a gravel and clay road is the most available and inexpensive road, and therefore the clay and gravel road is preferred. Until that question has been settled the appropriation is held up, and no road built. In order to expedite matters I suggest that there should be no conflict between the authorities of the State and the Federal Government. This amendment is to avoid that and to expedite road building.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman has finished I desire to speak briefly in reference to the question raised. I see perfectly well what is in the mind of the gentleman from Iowa, and I thoroughly agree with him. If there is any one thing we worked over in the sessions of our committee, it was the provisions designed to leave the determination of the types of road to be constructed, improved, or maintained to the determination of the authorities of the States concerned. We have specifically provided in our bill, and in the amendment that we have just offered, that the State shall bring a project of road construction, maintenance, or improvement in the first instance to the attention of the Department of Agriculture, thus primarily determining the type of road that it desires to have constructed, improved, or maintained. There is however ample power to reject any project placed in the hands of the Secretary. On the exercise of this power he may conceivably reject all the projects submitted, save those that relate to the construction of the highest types of hard roads. He can simply say, "No," to any project submitted to him, giving any ground of objection that may occur to him as a sufficient reason for this action. He may even withhold his approval without giving any reasons therefor. In other words the Secretary of Agriculture may abuse that very discretion that we have confided to him with a view to the protection of the interests of the Federal Government. This of course is a possibility.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. But I have no apprehension in my mind that in the practical execution of this bill any Secretary of Agriculture will undertake to lay down the law to any State, and take the position that he will not approve any project submitted, unless it relates to the construction, or improvement of some type of road that he has prescribed. I am perfectly willing to take my chances in this respect, feeling assured that any Secretary of Agriculture that may be hereafter appointed will do his duty, and execute the law according to its spirit and plain intent. Should he fail to do so, he will hear from this body without regard to its political complexion.

Mr. HAUGEN. I suggest that the remedy is to turn the money over to the State when the State has appropriated an equal amount; that you turn the money over to that State and leave it to the discretion and judgment of the authorities of that State to suggest what type of road shall be built and where and when.

And when the States have completed an equal amount, as they do under the vocational educational act and various other acts passed by this Congress, then leave it to the determination of the State. We have many excellent men in the department in this country, and great men, but their enthusiasm is liable to carry them away. They have less knowledge of the material available for the building of roads and requirements of that country than the people in their own country.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that the difficulty about that suggestion is that as soon as you change this bill to meet the gentleman's views, you will arouse antagonism in some other quarter. We have adequately guarded the expenditure of the Federal portion of the money that will be expended in aid of road construction, and maintenance. Having had that in view, and it was proper to have it in view, we have given certain discretionary powers to the Secretary of Agriculture. These powers may be abused. That is always possible when discretion is vested in an official, but I do not think that as a practical proposition there is any danger of the results of abuse, and malfeasance that seem to be apprehended by some of the opponents of this bill.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it not true that the discretion is limited now, because under the terms of the provision the only discretion that can be exercised by the Secretary of Agriculture is whether or not the proposed road comes under the terms of this act?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have stated that. He can simply put a veto on any particular project. He can not say affirmatively to a State that they must build this type of road, or that type of road, but, by abusing his discretion, I admit he can put a veto on any meritorious project. But I am not afraid of this action, as a part of a scheme by the Secretary of Agriculture to coerce a State, or direct its activities in road work along some prescribed course. He may of course err in his judgment with respect to some particular project. That is always conceivable with respect to any functionary filling a post calling for the exercise of discretion.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ROGERS. As I understood the amendment, it reads in part as follows:

The proportion of aid to be given any project, not to exceed 50 per cent of the total cost, shall be left to the State highway department.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. Now, if the State highway department asks for 50 per cent from the Federal Government, as it would be apt to ask, and the Secretary thinks it is a proper project that 30 per cent of Federal aid be given, he has no course but to accept the 50 per cent that he does not believe in, or take the other?

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is true. The change in the bill as reported was made to meet the objection that the discretion originally lodged in the Secretary of Agriculture afforded him an opportunity to play politics with a State. Hence we have taken from him the power to determine whether aid to the extent of 30, or 40, or 45, or 50 per cent of the total cost shall be afforded. Under the amendment that power will be vested in the State making the application. This change will not add to or take from the amounts apportioned to the several States.

Mr. ROGERS. Does not the gentleman jump from the frying pan into the fire in doing that?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Not a bit.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I would like to ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. Reserving the right to object, I should like five minutes. Can that be arranged?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I think so.

Mr. BORLAND. I would like five minutes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE] present?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I am.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I ask that the time be limited to 30 minutes, and that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE] control half of it and that I control the other half.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I regard this amendment, Mr. Chairman, as a very unfortunate amendment, and the substitute is a still more unfortunate proposition. I do not agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts that in most of the States the State will ask for 50 per cent on each proposition it submits to the Secretary of Agriculture. I do not think that can be the intention of the amendment. This bill contains not only the word "construction," but now, if the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is accepted the word "improvement" and also the word "maintenance" will be included. The evil of the old bill two years ago was that the money under it could all be spent for the temporary upkeep of unimproved roads, where the money would disappear before the next spring mud had cleared away. Under this bill, if it is amended by either of these propositions, the same thing is true.

If the Secretary of Agriculture has no discretion as to how the Federal money is to be spent, but must approve a proposition put up to him by the State authorities if the road comes within the purview of the roads mentioned by the bill, then it would be possible for the State authorities, under political pressure in their own States, to divide out the money into infinitesimal amounts to each particular road district in the State, and if there were 3,000 to 5,000 road districts in the State, as there are in some States, they would have to satisfy the demands of each one of those road districts. The result would be that you would have no money for real road improvement. You would have a little money before the primary in August to put from 20 to 50 men to work, but you would have no money for road improvement that would last until the December snow.

Mr. HAUGEN. Does the gentleman think that we should leave it to the legislature of the State?

Mr. BORLAND. I think to leave it to the legislature of the State to appropriate 50 per cent would be a better proposition. I think in the original proposition that the Federal Government should contribute not more than 50 per cent or less than 30 per cent, that the "less than 30 per cent" was, in my judgment, as important as "not more than 50 per cent," because that made certain that 30 per cent of work done on certain roads in the State would be under Federal supervision. The 30 per cent provision is so material a contribution to the road that it will guarantee a certain amount of definite improvement on that road. But if the contribution were reduced to 1 per cent or one-half of 1 per cent, it would be utterly impossible for the Federal money to be safeguarded.

Now, this wording still leaves in the words that "the Secretary shall demand such other information as he sees proper." But, if his hands are to be tied, I do not know what other information about these roads he could deem as proper to demand. I think he should have the right to demand other information, if he sees proper, to wit, the number of improved roads in the State, whether the State has any means of maintaining roads after they are constructed, and whether the taxing power is sufficient for that particular purpose. But if you are going to tie the hands of the Secretary and say that he must approve a proposition put up to him by the State authorities, you are going to have him in some States, I fear, not approve propositions for roads, but approve propositions for the temporary maintenance of unimproved roads.

There will be the pressure within the States, and naturally so, to divide the money equally between all the road districts, and that will give no road district enough to improve any road. Now, the Federal Government is not entering into any such proposition. To enter into such a proposition would be perfectly hopeless, and if we ever did enter into it there is not a man on this floor who would escape the constant effort to have that little driblet increased in favor of the local district. There was not a greater evil in the old bill, which was defeated two years ago, than that very proposition that all the Federal money could be and would, so far as we could see, be wasted in the temporary upkeep of roads.

If this money is going into roads, I am for it. If it is going into politics I am against it. I believe the farmers and the business men of this country would be against it in the latter event. They want roads and not politics, and they demand that there shall be legislation for the benefit of roads and not politics.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out a sufficient number of words to enable me to say something. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] is recognized.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a wide difference of opinion on this amendment and on the bill as to how far the authority of the States and of the Department of Agriculture should extend in the control, building, and maintenance of the roads to be aided by this legislation.

Indiana, I believe, according to the records, has more miles of good roads according to its area and its road mileage than any other State in the Union. We have built these roads at a very large expense to the taxpayers of the State. In a great many instances they have been built under the supervision and direction of overseers, who were novices at the business, and the precaution in the amendment and in the bill that provides that the Secretary of Agriculture must approve the plans and specifications is one of the valuable features of the bill, for the reason that some States, through political favoritism and otherwise, might select civil engineers for road work who would make plans that were faulty and to which no practical builder would give his approval.

Another matter, Mr. Chairman, and that is in the maintenance of these roads. It is not true that a road that is built under the specifications of a civil engineer necessarily wears out less rapidly than one that has been made by some competent country road supervisor. There is not anything in that argument, and gentlemen who have to do with country roads will agree with me on that proposition. Therefore, the purpose of the bill, to delegate to the Secretary of Agriculture the final word on the plans and specifications, is the one important feature of the bill and the one strongly favored by the people throughout the country who have been paying for the improvement of roads all these years, and many times spending money for improvements that are worth practically nothing. They are in favor of having some competent executive head pass upon all the plans and specifications for these roads and approve them before the people are asked to put up the money for their construction.

Therefore I feel, Mr. Chairman, that the argument of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is not only far fetched but irrelevant to the subject in hand; and while the committee has sought from every possible standpoint to protect this bill against the possibility of the expenditure of money by novices, or spending money upon roads that it would be impracticable to try to improve, it seems to me that we have fixed the authority in this bill exactly where it belongs. And moreover, if the Secretary of Agriculture——

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman misunderstands me. I am arguing for exactly and precisely the same thing that he is. I am arguing for this control by the Secretary of Agriculture over the plans and specifications.

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; but I disagree with the gentleman as to the Secretary of Agriculture having jurisdiction as to what roads are to be improved. I insist that he should have supervisory control over the plans and specifications, but that the State, or the local road officials, should have the initiative in the matter, and the say-so, so to speak, as to what roads should or should not be improved with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. BORLAND. Then the gentleman is opposed to the amendment.

Mr. BARNHART. No. I am in favor of the amendment.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I want to give a few observations on the merits of this bill which I, as a member of the Committee on Roads, helped to formulate and report for passage. The theory of this legislation is that it will help every section of the United States that will help itself in road improvement. For instance, any community that levies a road tax for the construction and maintenance of roads will receive from the Government 30 to 50 per cent of the cost of good roads and their upkeep if it will build them according to specifications that will make an efficient and durable road.

In the Indiana county in which I live the country at large would help to pay our road taxes and in fairness it ought to do so for two reasons. First, it would necessitate the building of all roads according to plans approved by Government experts; and second, the city automobilists who pay no road taxes wear out more roads with their big, high-powered automobiles than those who are now building and keeping up the roads. The public highway is the means of bringing the farmer close to the market and taking the market close to the farmer. If the roads are good the cost of transporting products is reduced to the minimum, and the farmer gains thereby, and he can also afford to sell his products cheaper to the consumer, because his marketing expense is reduced.

Mr. Chairman, I really have little to add to what I said in a speech on a similar bill in a former session of Congress; but I must call attention to the fact that if this demand for larger military preparedness is to be granted, good roads, over which military equipment could be rapidly and economically transported, are of first importance. And of all the preparedness we may provide, the money spent in improving roads is probably the only investment that will prove helpful in both war and peace. If we build these good roads, they will be useful if war should come, and if not—which God grant may be the outcome—the people can use the good roads profitably in peaceful pursuit of both business and pleasure. It is a good bill; it gives the rural taxpaying millions some direct returns for the taxes they pay instead of giving it all to rivers and harbors and to big cities, as has heretofore been done, and I earnestly hope it will become a law. It is high time the farmers and the dwellers in small cities and towns shall have some of the direct benefits of the Government taxes they pay.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman at this time.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS. Is it in order to propose an amendment to the committee amendment at this point?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, there is a substitute pending, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. One is a substitute for the entire amendment.

Mr. ROGERS. The amendment that I desire to propose, Mr. Chairman, is to strike out the word "fifty," where it appears in the committee amendment, and substitute therefor the word "twenty-five."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the committee amendment by striking out the word "fifty," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twenty-five," so that the lines will read, when amended: "The determination of the proportion of aid to be given any project not to exceed 25 per cent of the total cost shall be left to the State," etc.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I assume that the purpose of a bill of this sort, as proposed in a Federal enactment, must be to stimulate the building of roads by the several States. I think that if it does not have that purpose, and in so far as it falls short of that purpose, it is not a proper subject of Federal supervision and legislation.

As drafted by the committee, this amendment would require the expenditure by the States, taken altogether, of the same $25,000,000 as is authorized to be expended each year by the Federal Government. That is, the States together would put in each year $25,000,000 just to match the $25,000,000 that was put in by the Federal Government.

Now, this is, as I say, a question of stimulation, a question of stimulating the activity of the several States to build roads. If the proportion of Federal aid were 25 per cent instead of 50 per cent, I think no one would dispute that the States would equally take the steps which would be necessary in order to get their quota of the $25,000,000 fund; and, of course, the result of changing the percentage would be that the States, taken together, would be obliged to put in $50,000,000 instead of $25,000,000. In other words, all the States would take the steps to get their respective allotments, and in order to do that they would have to put in twice as much on their own account to build State roads.

In other words, we would be getting an assurance of $75,000,000 a year on this project, of which the Federal Government would put in one-third, instead of the assurance of spending but $50,000,000, of which the Federal Government would be putting in one-half. It seems to me that there can be no objection to this proposal. It simply carries out the self-help idea and makes it stronger, and makes it certain that there will be more roads constructed throughout the Union as the result of the passage of this act. I think that it was a mistake for the committee not to leave some discretion in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture, and that there might well be cases where the Secretary would say that there should be 40 per cent of Federal aid put in upon a certain project, but not 50 per cent. Yet under this plan the State itself must prescribe the amount which shall be expended, and the Secretary of Agriculture has no discretion whatever. He can simply say "Yes" or "No." I think that, in spite of what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] says, the State will in every case ask for the entire 50 per cent. That is the maximum allowed by the bill, and I can not imagine that a State will ever seek to get less than the maximum amount it is permitted to obtain.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the whole committee amendment on this point is ill advised, and if it is to be adopted we ought to change the maximum from 50 per cent to 25 per cent.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I should like to ask the gentleman, if we accept his amendment, will he vote for the bill?

Mr. ROGERS. I will vote against the bill with less enthusiasm if you accept my amendment.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I again renew my request that we may have some agreement as to the length of time that the debate shall continue on this section.

Mr. MANN. We would like 15 minutes on this side.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 25 minutes—15 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and 10 minutes by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 25 minutes—15 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and 10 minutes by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman from Illinois use some of his time?

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to read an amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. As I understand it, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] has an amendment to the amendment which has not beeen disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] to the committee amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ELSTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ELSTON: At the end of the section insert the following:

"The apportionment to each State as herein determined shall be available to such State under the provisions hereof for a period of five years after such apportionment is made."

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON] five minutes.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is in line with the observations which I made upon the bill the other day. In the State of California we have, in a way, temporarily exhausted ourselves by appropriations for good roads. We have spent $18,000,000 on the part of the State in building trunk-line roads within the last few years. The counties have contributed almost a like amount, and I should say offhand that we have recently spent, altogether, nearly $50,000,000. Now our plan is a contributory plan, something like the provisions of this bill, and I believe that most of the counties in our State would like to lie fallow for a while. I think they have stripped themselves of money available for these purposes for some time to come.

Another consideration that I wish to bring before the House is this: I see nothing in this bill providing for legislation within the State for the distribution of this bounty that comes from the Federal Treasury. For instance, we have a highway commission which was organized with the idea of spending State moneys only. If this bounty comes into our State, I venture to say that there is no provision at all on our books for the equitable distribution of this money to the various political units of the State or for its application to our State system. If our highway commission is notified that there is subject to its order something like $600,000 or $700,000, it will have no authority to proceed with its distribution. As we all know, executive officers have little discretion. Our commission might be blocked until legislation is passed that would permit equitable distribution of this bounty coming from the Federal Government. I imagine many other States would be in a like situation. Now, if such legislation is not passed in the State to meet the provisions of this bill, the State highway commissioner, or other officer in the State who receives this bounty or who is to dispense it, might distribute it by favoritism or preference. I can not conceive of any equitable or legal way to distribute it unless the States themselves legislate upon the subject. That may take several years. It may take several years for my State to put itself in a position where it can take advantage of this act. At this time we might be able to take advantage of this subsidy only by making a plea for maintenance. To make that plea we would have to stretch matters somewhat, because we might have to say to the Federal Government that we needed $600,000 or $700,000 a year for the purposes of maintenance, and we can not tell exactly what the construction of the Secretary of Agriculture will be as to the scope of the word "maintenance." He might say that our particular requirements in the way of maintenance do not mean maintenance according to his construction of the act. I imagine that it may take some time to prepare ourselves to receive the benefits of this bill. I believe five years' time is none too long for the money to lie in the Treasury to the credit of the State. Otherwise a State might lose its apportionment by lapse into the Treasury at the end of the biennial period.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of good roads. Having been born and reared upon a farm, in Warren County, Mo., I am, in my judgment, the better able to realize their necessity. The farmers of our country are important factors in our development and material progress. That which is for the benefit of the farmers must also be for the best interest of the merchants and people who live in the towns and cities. I represent a district in the great and splendid city of St. Louis, and I am sure I voice the best sentiments of that people in giving my support to any feasible scheme that will enable the United States Government to assist the State governments to establish better highways. The people of my district pay as great a proportion of taxes to the United States Government as perhaps 10 other districts in Missouri, outside of St. Louis and Kansas City. Yet we are willing to aid the farmers to the end that every possible facility be given to the establishing of good roads in order that the commerce of the country may be marketed as easily and as cheaply as possible. Yet, Mr. Chairman, I am not in favor of this Federal aid becoming a political asset, to be used by whichever party may be in power in the various States, as I fear would be the case should this amendment be agreed to. The United States Government should have the supervisory control and the authority to see that the money thus expended is for the benefit of the people generally, and to the end that some splendid roads and highways may result therefrom.

I have not much confidence in any legislation that the Democratic Party is able to enact. Since they have been in power, practically all the laws they have caused to be written in the statute books are injurious to the farmers and the people generally. But the farmers of this country are fast coming to realize and to know that their prosperity of the past and of the future has and must come from the wholesome laws of the Republican Party. This is also especially true as to good roads, for that will only be realized under the next Republican administration. Even should this bill pass, which I do not think there is any intention that it shall, there would be no money to carry out its provisions. To prove this, we have only to refer to the President's message delivered to this Congress on the 7th of December last. In that message, he said:

Assuming that the taxes imposed by the emergency revenue act and the present duty on sugar are to be discontinued, the deficit in the general fund of the Treasury on the 30th of June, 1917, will be $235,000,000.

While the "war tax" or emergency revenue act, as the President calls it, was reenacted by Congress, since the President delivered his message, and while it is also evident that the "free sugar" act will be repealed, there will still be an enormous deficit in the Treasury. The President is now asking for millions for preparedness, and so forth, and therefore we all know that there will never be any appropriation made during this administration for good roads. This bill, therefore, is apparently only to try and jolly the farmers along until after the next election. "It is molasses to catch flies." The principal purpose of the Democratic Party is to stay in office, and to do this they are willing to go the limit to deceive the farmers and the people. This Democratic administration is even trying to convince the farmers that their prosperity now is due to laws enacted by them. The farmers well know, however, that their present prosperity is due to the war in Europe. For instance, they know that the sale of wheat to Europe during the first year that the Underwood tariff law was in force amounted to only $103,595,000, while during the first year of the war this increased to the sum of $316,262,000. This is due to the large armies in Europe that had to be fed. This is also a fact with reference to other things that the farmers sell. During the same period the sale of breadstuffs increased from $181,484,000 to $567,607,000; hay, from $790,000 to $2,263,000; meats and dairy products, from $138,736,000 to $243,098,000; sugar, from $4,341,000 to $36,816,000. Mules, which are raised by our Missouri farmers in abundance, increased from $622,000 to $18,041,000, and horses from $3,177,000 to $82,276,000.

The farmers are prosperous for the reason stated, as well as for the reason that our many factories and mills are in full blast now manufacturing products for the armies in Europe, and which gives to American labor employment, thus enabling them to buy foodstuffs in abundance from the farmers. For instance, we see from the statistics that during the year that the Democratic tariff law was in force prior to the war that we only sold to Europe wool goods to the value of $4,753,000, while during the first year of the war the sale of these goods increased to the extent of $32,057,000; during the same period we saw the sale of men's shoes for our European trade increase from $9,603,000 to $22,669,000; other goods manufactured from leather increased during this period from $43,390,000 to $90,804,000.

I know these facts not only from the statistics but because there are more shoes manufactured in my district than there is in any other in the United States. My district also manufactures much harness and saddlery that has been and is going to Europe. During the first year under the Democratic tariff law this country sold to Europe $793,000 worth of harness and saddlery, yet during the first year of the war we sold $18,434,000 worth. Missouri is a great zinc-producing State, but the Underwood tariff law would have ruined it entirely had not the war in Europe come along. Zinc is used in the making of shells, and so we increased our sales to Europe from $785,000 worth in the year before the war to $26,323,000 worth during the first year of the war. This is also true of lead, brass, steel, and other things that go to make shells and munitions of war. Our gain during this period for steel amounted to 186 per cent, firearms 265 per cent, wire 153 per cent, explosives 1,050 per cent, tools 175 per cent, medical appliances 231 per cent. Taking the same period we find that, in the first instance, our railroads were idle, cars were standing still, and railway business in bad condition; yet now these cars are all being used carrying provisions and munitions of war to the ocean to be sent to Europe. The shipyards are busy building ships for Europe; the automobile manufacturing industry is greatly increasing. We sold automobiles to Europe during the first year of the war worth $92,000,000—170 per cent gain over the year preceding that.

The farmers of our country are intelligent, and they have passed that stage when the Democratic Party can longer deceive and fool them. They know that protection to their industries is necessary, and that had not the war of Europe come they would be in the same condition to-day that they were in during the administration of Cleveland. Free cattle from Canada, Argentine Republic, and South America would have ruined that industry had not these countries found markets for their products over in Europe. The farmers of the country will take the first opportunity to restore the protective tariff. Otherwise they will suffer terribly when the war in Europe closes and these millions of men return to civil pursuits, and thereby compete with the people of this country in the products of the American farm, mill, and mine. Our first duty, therefore, is to drive from power the present administration, and then to encourage prosperity at home as a permanent thing. The protective tariff is absolutely necessary to do this. It raises the revenue to run the Government and is practically paid by the foreign manufacturers. It also protects our labor against the cheaper labor of those countries. It also protects us against child labor.

The Democratic administration realizes now that its Underwood tariff law has been a failure, and that the free-trade and revenue-tariff law such as they enacted will not suit the needs of the people of this country. We see the President of the United States now advocating a tariff board. He has already declared in favor of the protective tariff on sugar. Both of these things he declared against during his campaign for the Presidency. In fact, the Baltimore platform has been repudiated so many times by the President that I doubt if any of its framers would now recognize it. First, we find that he gave special indorsement to that provsion of the platform which allowed free passage to American coastwise ships through the Panama Canal.

When he had become the President he asked for and secured the repeal of that law. He has never told us why he changed his mind upon that. Some years ago the President regarded Mr. William Jennings Bryan with disfavor and wanted to destroy his influence with the party, yet as the Baltimore convention came on Mr. Wilson sought Mr. Bryan's support and acclaimed him a great Democrat, and Mr. Bryan supported Mr. Wilson at Baltimore, and Mr. Wilson appointed Mr. Bryan Secretary of State. Now we find the President in favor of preparedness, yet only a short time ago he was against that. Not over a year ago he was against a tariff commission, yet now he has come out publicly in favor of that. We do not know what he will do next. He has almost indorsed the Republican position upon the tariff, and probably before election time he will be a higher protectionist than any Republican ever was. Yet, Mr. Chairman, will the farmers of this country follow the President in his many changes? Will they not say at the next election that they would rather support the party that has fixed principles and maintains them year in and year out? The Republicans have been in favor of a tariff board for a long time. They had one established during the administration of President Taft, but it was abolished by the Democrats as useless. The position of the Republican Party on this question was clearly stated by President Taft in his letter of acceptance of the Republican nomination in 1912, when he said:

The American people may rest assured that should the Republican Party be restored to power in all legislative branches all the schedules in the present tariff of which complaint is made will be subjected to investigation and report by a competent and impartial tariff board and to the reduction or change which may be necessary to square the rates with the facts.

It is only necessary to refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of past Congresses to find that the leaders of the Democratic Party have year in and year out declared that it was unconstitutional to collect tariff duties except for revenue. They called the protective tariff "tariff robbery." The platforms of the Republican Party have for years declared for protective tariff and for a tariff commission. The last declaration of my party upon this question was as follows:

The pronounced feature of modern industrial life is its enormous diversification. To apply tariff rates justly to these changing conditions requires closer study and more scientific methods than ever before. The Republican Party has shown by its creation of a tariff board its recognition of this situation and its determinationto be equal to it.

We condemn the Democratic Party for its failure either to provide funds for the continuance of this board or to make some other provision for securing the information requisite for intelligent tariff legislation. We protest against the Democratic method of legislating on these vitally important subjects without careful investigation.

How fast the President is coming to the Republican position upon a tariff commission is evidenced by the fact that the position of the President is practically the same as that contained in the bill H. R. 154, introduced on the 6th of last December by Congressman NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, of Ohio. Section 3 of Mr. LONGWORTH'S bill is as follows:

That it shall be the duty of said commission to investigate the cost of production of all articles which by any act of Congress now in force or hereafter enacted are made the subject of tariff legislation, with special reference to the prices paid domestic and foreign labor and the prices paid for raw materials, whether domestic or imported, entering into manufactured articles, producers' prices and retail prices of commodities, whether domestic or imported, the condition of domestic and foreign markets affecting the American products, including detailed information with respect thereto, together with all other facts which may be necessary or convenient in fixing import duties or in aiding the President and other officers of the Government in the administration of the customs laws, and said commission shall also make investigation of any such subject whenever directed by either House of Congress.

The thing that the farmers of the country want above everything else is good markets for their products. The protective tariff gives that to them. Mills, factories, mines, and everything are prosperous when that law is in operation. It has been so in the past, and it will be so in the next administration. We want a just tariff. We want a tariff that will equal the difference between cost of production at home and abroad. This principle takes into consideration cheap foreign labor, child labor, convict labor, and so forth. The important question is to establish that principle in law and to keep in there. Then we should have a tariff commission, as suggested by Republicans many times, and which we had in the last administration, but which was abolished by the Democrats.

This tariff commission should be charged with the duty of getting data that can be secured bearing upon the subject of tariff, and analyze, classify, and arrange the same so that it will be readily available for the use of the Congress, which, under the Constitution, is the only body authorized to fix the tariff. It should be a nonpartisan commission, and not such a commission as would be appointed by President Wilson should he have the power. Every commission that he has appointed, including the Federal Reserve Board, has been strictly partisan. The mind of the President does not contemplate the finding of efficient and patriotic men to gather this information except within his own party. For that reason a tariff commission appointed by the President would not be of any benefit. The present administration has failed utterly, even after it has shifted its position numerous times, and the people of this country who believe in protection are only waiting for the opportunity to correct the mistake which they made at the last election, when by dividing they allowed a minority party to come into power. All responsible for that are truly sorry, and they will make good their mistake in a patriotic way by giving their votes in the next election for the Republican candidates for President and Vice President. And, Mr. Chairman, the intelligent farmers of Missouri and of the Nation will do their part to bring this happy result about.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, for this reason, among many other good ones, I am pleased to vote for this bill for good roads in order to show my appreciation of the sturdy men and women of the farms—they who have done so much for our great Republic. My vote for this bill will not bring us good roads, as I have stated above, because we have no money in the Treasury; but it is a declaration that the Congress of the United States favors helping the farmers to market their products and to give them good roads for that purpose. But we will have to wait till the Republicans come into power and restore business and replenish the depleted Treasury before we can actually do anything along the lines indicated in this bill. But we have to start it going, and if only to establish the principle involved in the bill I hope, Mr. Chairman, that in its best possible shape it will become a law. [Applause.]

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 7, strike out all after the semicolon and insert the following: "That the proper authorities of the State shall be required to report to the Secretary of Agriculture on or before the 1st day of December of each year a detailed statement of the amount of money received under this act during the previous fiscal year and of its disbursement on forms prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture; that if any portion of the moneys received by the designated authorities of a State under this act shall by any action or contingency be diminished or lost or be misapplied it shall be replaced by said State, and until so replaced no subsequent appropriation shall be apportioned to said State; that if the Secretary of Agriculture shall withhold from a State the whole or any part of an allotment of money under this act the facts and reasons therefor shall be reported to the President and the amount involved shall be kept separate in the Treasury until the expiration of the Congress next succeeding a session of the legislature of the State from which allotment of money has been withheld, in order that the State may, if it shall so desire, appeal to Congress from the determination of the Secretary of Agriculture. If the next Congress shall not direct such money to be paid it shall be covered into the Treasury."

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN].

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, as I have said before during consideration of this bill, I approve its purpose to provide money from the Federal Treasury to assist States in construction and maintenance of their highways; but the bill is faulty in some respects, and its operation will be cumbersome and expensive if enacted in its present form. My amendment is offered with the idea of lessening the expense of administration and to make the law more satisfactory to the States. The amendment follows as nearly as may be the provisions of the Lever agricultural-extension law, approved May 8, 1914, under which each State receives an allotment of money each year for agricultural-extension work, to be carried on by the agricultural colleges in cooperation with the Department of Agriculture. If the amendment is adopted it will not be necessary for the Secretary of Agriculture, before paying money to a State, to examine all work which has been done on all highways by employing a vast number of inspectors or clerks in the department. It would seem to me that if we are going to avoid danger of using too much of the money to be provided by this road bill for administration, if we are going to prevent or limit as far as possible the employment of inspectors to run over the States to look over the road work that has been done, causing all kinds of trouble, distrustful of the States, we should adopt this amendment. Many gentlemen of the House would, I think, be surprised if they knew how much of an appropriation made by Congress and intended for practical work is used by the departments in "administration." I recall that only a few years ago the Secretary of Agriculture and other officials of that department told the Committee on Agriculture of the wonderful things they had accomplished, of the results of their investigations and experiments and analyses, and of the great benefit they would be able to confer upon the business of agriculture of the country—that agriculture could be revolutionized—if they had opportunity of taking the results of their work directly to the farmers of the country in such form or in such a way as to make them easily understood and readily available. We said, "Then, all you need is money for practical work?" They replied, "Yes"; and on the recommendation of the committee large appropriations were authorized for practical work, and it was not at all satisfactory to us to learn later that the department was devoting a large portion of the appropriation and had arranged to use large portions for salaries of clerks and other employees in the department; that is, in administration.

But I should like to speak of the bill as a whole and of its purpose to provide Federal aid to the States in the construction and maintenance of highways. I shall, if I have time, refer again to my amendment, which is offered for the purpose of making the machinery of this bill correspond to that of the Lever law, by which the Department of Agriculture is operating smoothly and satisfactorily with agricultural colleges.

This bill, in its main features, has my hearty support. It does not meet my views entirely, but it is certainly a step in the right direction; it is a proper, although tardy, response on the part of the Congress to an insistent demand of the country. The amount of money which may annually be appropriated if this bill becomes law, is small, but later, when ineffective and oppressive revenue laws shall be repealed and a system of wise laws which always provide revenue sufficient for every proper activity of government are enacted, this law can be and will be amended and more money will be appropriated.

What are the important provisions of this bill? It authorizes an annual appropriation of not more than $25,000,000 to be used and disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, as follows: The Secretary shall deduct the sum which he shall deem necessary to defray the expenses of his department in the administration of the act and apportion the balance among the States in the following manner: Sixty-five thousand dollars shall be paid to each State and one-half of the remainder in the ratio which the population of each State bears to the population of all the States as shown by the latest Federal census, and the other half of such remainder in the ratio which the mileage of rural free delivery and star mail routes in such States bears to the mileage of rural free delivery and star mail routes of all the States; the State highway department of any State may apply to the Secretary of Agriculture for aid under this act in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads, and the highway department shall furnish the Secretary with surveys, plans, specifications, and estimates of cost of the proposed construction or maintenance and any other information which he may consider proper; after examination and approval of such surveys, plans, specifications, and estimates of cost, the Secretary shall determine the amount of aid to be given, which, in no case, shall be less than 30 nor more than 50 per cent of the reasonable cost of such improvement; when such work of construction or maintenance shall have been completed, the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine whether or not the work has been done and finished in substantial compliance with the surveys, plans, and specifications which were submitted by the authorities of the State, and upon favorable determination of that matter, he shall cause to be paid to the proper authority of said State whatever remains unpaid of the amount allotted to the State under this act; the Secretary of Agriculture may make or cause to be made such inspection and examination of any road constructed or maintained under this act as he shall deem necessary, and, for that purpose, shall have power to employ such assistants, clerks, and other persons in the city of Washington and elsewhere, to purchase such materials and supplies, and to prescribe such rules and regulations for the administration of this act as he may consider expedient; all payments of money from appropriations of this act shall be made by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The work of the committee in preparing this bill, or the result it has tried to reach, meets my hearty approval because it recommends Federal aid in construction and maintenance of the common highways of the country, and not construction of a few expensive trunk lines between large cities or over or through a portion of country to be reached or traversed solely or principally by sight-seers or pleasure seekers. The intent and plain purpose of this bill is to provide appropriations for construction of roads from farming sections to railroad stations and market towns for practical, everyday, necessary use of the people in carrying on their business, and not for construction of roads for joy riding or for use of automobiles alone. Money available under this law will very likely for some years be used in building and maintaining highways over which rural mail is carried, roads in which the Federal Government, in conducting its post-office business, is directly interested. Improvement of post roads is, perhaps, the first duty of the Federal Government, and for some time this use of money will confer as much benefit and offer as much assistance and encouragement to the States as can reasonably be expected. And, besides, I believe that roads over which rural mail is carried are now the main roads or the principally traveled roads in almost every rural community. But as time goes on, as the wisdom of this law is proven by experience, and as larger sums of money are available the work can and will be extended to assisting the States in construction and maintenance of other roads. There is practically no limit to the need of good roads or to the benefit that will accrue from their construction. I am so much pleased with the evident willingness of Congress to admit its duty to the people and to see the work begun on a limited scale that I am not disposed at this time to criticize the plan proposed by this bill on the ground that it does not go far enough. It will prove the value of the policy and the good work will be properly extended.

Some gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to this bill evidently do not appreciate the need and the benefit of good roads; they seem not to know that a system of roads, properly constructed and maintained, is necessary to the improvement and development of every part of the country. Other gentlemen, while admitting the necessity and benefit of good roads, insist that the advantage is entirely local; that it is the duty of the people of portions of the country in which the advantage is to be enjoyed to bear all expense themselves; and that the purpose and effect of this bill will be to impose local duties and local burdens upon the Federal Government.

I hardly know what to say to these gentlemen, or, rather, hardly know how or where to begin to offer facts and arguments to convince them of their error. My time is limited, and, besides, the converse of the position taken by these gentlemen is so clear to me as the proper view to be taken that it ought not to be necessary to spend time and effort to disprove their statements. It is doubtful if there is any public improvement more necessary than the building of country highways, or any expenditure of public money (from whatever source it may come) that will result in greater development or conduce more to the general welfare of the country than in the construction and maintenance of our country roads. Good roads running between railroad stations and the farms, and leading from the farms to the market places, are absolutely necessary alike to the proper and profitable business of railroads and market towns and to the business of the farms. Construction of railroads and their proper management provide some of the facilities and solve some of the problems of transportation, but these problems will not be solved, in fact will not approach solution, until the people of the country, assisted as they must be by Federal legislation, are able to construct and maintain systems of highways connecting stations with farming sections of the country and with places not reached by railroads. Many of the railroads of the country have been assisted by contributions of money and other property by the Federal and State Governments; the building of railroads has very properly been encouraged and in some instances greatly assisted by donation of public land and by Government guaranteeing payment of the bonds of the companies. The people have usually approved the efforts made and the means used to encourage and assist in the construction of railroads; they know the necessity of railroads and they appreciate that wonderful growth and development have come as the result of their construction and operation. But while generally approving the assistance which has been given to railroads and, I may add, to rivers and harbors, the people feel the Government has overlooked the need of improved country highways, and has failed to perform its duty to encourage and assist in their construction.

The building and maintaining of good roads is not entirely a local need or a local benefit; the matter of expense of transporting farm products, whether the profit shall be large or small, does not concern the farmers alone; it concerns all the people. If there is no road from a farm to a market, or if travel over a road is difficult and expensive, the farmer may be unwilling or unable to dispose of his products; or if he takes them to market he may demand and possibly be able to receive higher prices than consumers are able or ought to be required to pay. The almost inevitable result of such a situation is, however, that the farmer, in spite of trouble and expense, will take his products to market and will receive therefor such price as the buyer is willing to pay, a price which will yield him smaller profit than his investment and his labor fairly entitle him to; smaller profit than he would have realized if he had had the advantage of a good road for the quick, cheap, and convenient transportation of his products.

Nearly every Member of this House at one time or another has talked about the "high cost of living"; many have assumed to tell us of causes or reasons for high prices, and occasionally some one rises and takes our valuable time to tell of a cure he has discovered. Members representing districts in large cities usually tell us the trouble is that farmers receive too much money for their produce; that the farmers are making too much profit. I have not time nor am I disposed to answer such statements, except to say that they are made by men who know nothing of the investment of the average farmer and nothing of the labor and other expense of the average farmer in producing his crops and in putting them on the market. Two or three years ago the then Secretary of Agriculture, James Wilson, after careful investigation, said that the average prices received by the farmers of the country are not more than one-half the prices paid by consumers. No; the farmers are not responsible for the high cost of living; farmers are not receiving too large prices or making too large profits. But it is true that it costs farmers too much—too much time, too much trouble, and too much money—to market their crops; and this loss of time and money is due to the poor condition of the roads over which they travel.

If roads were in good condition, farm products could be carried to market more quickly and easily and the farmers might be willing to accept lower prices than they now receive and still have larger profit, or the result might be that the farmers, reaching the consumer with less trouble and expense and dispensing with some of the middle men, would receive a larger part of the price the consumer pays. Either result will justify the use of money as provided by this bill; either would be satisfactory to the farmers; and they certainly are right in asking consideration of their welfare at the hands of Congress. And if advantage and profit are to be realized by both farmers and consumers, certainly their combined interests can not be ignored.

I can not agree with these gentlemen from some of the large cities who object to the use of Federal money in the improvement of highways over which rural mail is carried. They evidently feel that, inasmuch as the Federal Government has established the rural routes and maintains the Rural Mail Service, the highways ought to be constructed and maintained by State or local authority without assistance from the Government. They seem to think that the Rural Mail Service was established for the sole benefit of farmers, patrons of the rural routes, and that from a sense of gratitude for favors shown and benefits conferred upon them the farmers as a class ought to be willing to tax themselves to meet all expense of providing good roads upon and over which the mail business, carried on for their convenience and advantage, is done. These gentlemen point to the fact that the Rural Mail Service is not self-supporting; that in fact it costs above $30,000,000 each year more than it yields in postal revenue; and they evidently think the service should be so reduced that its cost shall not be greater than its receipts. The theory upon which these gentlemen proceed is wrong. The Rural Mail Service is not for the convenience and advantage of patrons of the routes alone, it is for the benefit of the entire country, fully as much for the benefit of business men of the cities as for the patrons of the routes.

If one thinks the Rural Mail Service is for the sole use and advantage of the people of country districts, he should get information as to the amount and character of mail matter delivered by rural carriers. He will learn that publishers of daily newspapers reach farmers as easily as they reach city subscribers; that city merchants reach farmers with their advertisements as easily and almost as quickly as they reach the people of the cities, who were formerly their only customers; that farmers do not now find it necessary to depend upon weekly newspapers, but subscribe for and receive daily newspapers and also receive magazines and other publications as regularly and as generally as do the people of cities.

One who believes that the rural mails are for the benefit of only one class of our people—farmers and other patrons of rural routes—will change his mind as he learns the extent to which these rural patrons use the mails and avail themselves of the advantage which daily delivery of mail gives them of keeping in touch with what is going on in the world, and as he learns the manner and extent of use of the mails by people of the cities to keep in touch with the business of rural communities and with the farmers themselves.

In my opinion the business men and publishers of newspapers and magazines would make the first and most strenuous objection to the suggestion, if anyone were foolish enough to make it, that the system or policy of rural mail be abandoned or restricted. And that being true, as I am sure it is, why do residents of large cities, even Representatives of cities in Congress, tell us that patrons of rural routes ought to bear all the expense of Rural Mail Service or that the cost of the service should not be greater than its receipts?

The rural service is a part of the great mail service of the country, just as proper and just as necessary as the City Delivery Service. It would be unreasonable to say the character and extent of city service should be limited by its receipts or that the cost of post-office equipment, including cost of building, should be paid by the taxpayers of the city, and it is just as unreasonable to say that the expense of furnishing local equipment and facilities for the rural mail service, including construction and maintenance of highways, shall all be paid by the patrons of rural routes or by the taxpayers of local communities having advantage of the service.

Mr. Chairman, I should be willing to approve the purpose of measures like this even if I believed, as is contended by some Members, that it will confer greater and more direct advantage upon rural communities than upon the great centers of business and population. I shall not be deterred from supporting this bill because Members call it class legislation. Even if it were for the particular or more direct benefit of farmers, should it not be passed? It is true that farmers, as a class, have been benefited by Federal legislation, even by legislation intended for the direct advantage and profit of other classes, but in almost every instance the benefit to farmers has been indirect. Farmers as a class have been benefited by the development of great manufactures and by large industrial activities which have been encouraged and protected by Federal legislation, but the benefit to farmers has been indirect. It is urged that this bill, if it becomes law, will confer direct benefits upon farmers by furnishing Federal aid and by cooperating in the building of highways. Why not? It will give aid and encouragement to a class of our people who need relief from the burdens they have been bearing; it will be helpful to a class of our people who deserve consideration at the hands of the Government.

The bill before us is not entirely satisfactory. I believe it will result in the employment of too many men, agents of the Government, to inspect highways after they have been constructed, because the bill provides that before the money promised by the Federal Government as its share of the expense of constructing any road can be paid to the State, the work done on the road must be inspected, so that the Government may know the State has earned and is entitled to the money. This duty of inspecting roads involves inspection of every road upon which work is done by a State in cooperation with the Government, and a very large number of men must necessarily be employed for this purpose. Too much of the money appropriated by Congress for assisting and cooperating with the States, money which is needed and ought to be used in actual construction and maintenance of roads, will be used up in salaries and expenses of men running about the country; too much money will be used by the Government in "administration." And, besides, I dislike the employment of so many Federal employees for work in the States. The amendment I offer will, I believe, remove these very objectionable features. The Lever law of which I have spoken provides money to be paid to or to be available to the States, to enable agricultural colleges, in cooperation with the Department of Agriculture, to carry on extension work, like farm-management and farm-demonstration work.

Section 2 of that law provides that the cooperative work to be done by the department and the colleges "shall be carried on in such manner as may be mutually agreed upon by the Secretary of Agriculture and the State agricultural college or colleges receiving the benefits of this act."

In section 3 is found the following provision:

That before the funds herein appropriated shall become available to any college for any fiscal year, plans for the work to be carried on under this act shall be submitted by the proper officials of each college and approved by the Secretary of Agriculture.

It will be seen that a similar provision appears in section 3 of this road bill. The highway department of the State is required to submit and furnish to the Secretary of Agriculture "surveys, plans, specifications, and estimates of cost of said proposed construction or maintenance and any other information which he may consider proper," and if the Secretary shall approve these surveys and estimates he shall determine the amount of money to be paid the State for the proposed construction or maintenance and shall notify the State highway department of his finding. This road bill further provides that the highway authorities of the State may thereupon "commence and prosecute said construction or maintenance in substantial compliance with said surveys, plans, and specifications."

Up to this point the provisions of the Lever law and the provisions of this bill are similar. The following provision of this bill, the one that I point out as objectionable, is that, although the Secretary of Agriculture may have approved surveys and plans of a road and estimates of its cost and has directed or permitted the State highway commissioner to proceed with the work with the understanding that Federal money will be forthcoming, the Secretary will not be permitted—if this bill becomes a law—to make any payment to the State until he, the Secretary, "shall find that said construction or maintenance of said road has been finished in substantial compliance with said surveys, plans, and specifications."

This means, as I have said, the employment of a very large number of men whose duty it shall be to make actual inspection of every highway in the country to which the Federal Government is contributing money. Federal employees will overrun the States, and as I also point out, a very large part of the appropriations which this law will authorize will be used in paying salaries and expenses of these inspectors and in other respects for "administration." It seems to me that much of this objectionable employment and this use of large sums of money can easily be avoided by inserting in this bill a provision practically the same as the provision in the Lever law, which, as I indicate, provides that the proper officer of the State which has received Federal money under that act—

Shall be required to report to the Secretary of Agriculture on or before the 1st day of September of each year a detailed statement of the amount so received during the previous fiscal year and of its disbursement on forms prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture—that if any portion of the money received by the designated officer or by any State for the support and maintenance of cooperative agricultural extension work, as provided in this act, shall, by any action or contingency, be diminished or lost or be misapplied, it shall be replaced by said State to which it belongs, and until so replaced no subsequent appropriation shall be apportioned or paid to said State.

It is important to notice that the Lever Act contains a saving clause, or a clause that protects the authorities of the States against improper or unjust action on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture. This clause is found in section 6, and is as follows:

If the Secretary of Agriculture shall withhold a certificate from any State of its appropriation, the facts and reasons therefor shall be reported to the President, and the amount involved shall be kept separate in the Treasury until the expiration of the Congress next succeeding a session of the legislature of any State from which a certificate has been withheld, in order that the State may, if it should so desire, appeal to Congress from the determination of the Secretary of Agriculture. If the next Congress shall not direct such sum to be paid, it shall be covered into the Treasury.

I wish to suggest to the committee which prepared this bill and now has charge of it in the House that the changes I suggest by incorporation of features of the Lever law be given careful consideration. If this law shall be so framed as to give due notice to State authorities that Federal money must be used exactly or, as the act says, "in substantial compliance" with plans, specifications, estimates, and so forth, submitted to the Secretary of Agriculture, and that failure or refusal on their part fully or "substantially" to comply with the provisions of the law under which they receive money will make it necessary for the Secretary to withhold further payment of money, I believe every State will be anxious and willing to make "substantial" compliance with this law and with the demands of the Secretary. They certainly will not wish to have a horde of Federal employees—clerks from the department—running over the State, possibly as many inspectors as there are roads on which work under this act has been done, and possibly as many conclusions reached and reports made on the work done by the State, one road approved and another road similarly constructed, rejected.

I wish the committee and the House to give careful consideration to the danger that too much money, too large a part of the appropriation intended for and actually needed by the States, will be devoted to "administration." The annual appropriation to be made, if this law is enacted, is much too small to permit of frittering it away in salaries and expenses of clerks and inspectors, many of whom can easily and properly be dispensed with if the bill is amended in keeping with my suggestion.

I am not able to agree with those, or sympathize with the reason or excuse offered by those, who oppose this measure on the ground of "economy" or failing revenues. They admit the importance of good roads and the duty of our Government to supply financial aid to the States to construct and maintain them, but they say the present unfortunate condition of the Federal Treasury will not permit the appropriation of money—even the small sum of $25,000,000—for the purpose. One who uses this argument or offers this excuse practically says to the people of the country that, inasmuch as they, the people, have placed in control of our Government a political party which now, as always when intrusted with power, repeals laws by which revenue may be provided and deliberately enacts laws and pursues policies which fail, as such laws and such policies have always failed, to supply revenue, therefore the people are willing and ought to be willing to submit uncomplainingly, if not cheerfully, to the embarrassment, inconvenience, and loss which inevitably follow the failure of that political party to provide money for carrying on proper and necessary work or to enable it to do its duty to the country.

If it were impossible to obtain money authorized by this bill without embarrassing the administration in lines of work which must be carried on, I should not support this bill; I should wait a year or two until the old policy will be in force and laws placed on the statute books which will provide money; but I support the measure in the belief that even the unwise revenue laws enacted during this administration will supply money for this worthy purpose. This bill calls for only $25,000,000. Almost every day this session the Congress—of its own accord or on demand of some executive department—will or is liable to enact into law some measure carrying an appropriation which might be and ought to be reduced by at least $25,000,000.

The Congress is blamed for extravagant and altogether unnecessary appropriations, but the fault is not all with the Congress. The administration and the several executive departments are as much, if not more, to blame than the Congress for this extravagance. The committees of the House and Senate have prepared a table comparing, by bills, estimates of regular annual appropriations for the fiscal year 1916 (passed last year) with those for 1917 (to be considered at this session). This table shows that the executive departments have presented estimates which they demand shall be approved and enacted into law by this session of Congress carrying appropriations which are larger by $195,082,673.78 than their estimates and demands of last year, larger by $170,920,796.14 than all appropriations actually made by the Congress last year. This table, prepared by the House and Senate committees, shows also the total estimated revenues for the year ending June 30, 1917, and contains the following statement:

The estimated appropriations (demanded by the administration) for 1917 will be found in detail in the Annual Book of Estimates, House Document No. 27, transmitted to Congress December 6, 1915, and the estimated revenues for 1917 in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year 1915.

The appropriations estimated for by the administration and demanded of this Congress are $1,285,857,808.16, and the estimated revenue out of which these appropriations are to be paid are $919,500,000; that is, the administration and heads of executive departments, acting together, are asking this Congress to appropriate $366,357,808.16 more than the Treasury will receive.

It is true the estimates of the administration include an increase of $46,806,971.48 for a larger Army and an increase of $72,255,354.36 for a larger Navy, and possibly the people of the country, or those who believe the administration's program of preparedness ought to be carried out just as he has presented it, will say that there is no evidence of extravagance; that the increases to be provided for Army and Navy account for the excessive demands appearing in the estimates; but the increases for the Army and Navy amount to only $119,062,325.84, whereas the total increase in the estimates is $195,082,673.78, or $76,020,347.94 greater than or in addition to increases demanded for Army and Navy. And, besides, it should be known that the administration reports to Congress the advisability of decreasing some of the appropriations; for example, decrease of $5,535,000 in the appropriation to be made for pensions, a decrease for which the administration is not responsible and for which it can claim no credit; that in spite of and over and above these decreases, for which no credit can be claimed, the total increase demanded is $195,082,673.78 larger than was estimated for and demanded last year, and larger by $170,920,796.14 than all appropriations made by Congress last year.

These facts and figures certainly fully support the charge that the administration and not Congress is most to be blamed for extravagance. But Congress can not escape responsibility. The executive departments make their demands, but Congress holds the purse strings. Congress has authority, if it has courage, to refuse extravagant demands of the administration, even if the estimates have been prepared and are urged with ability and vigor by members of the Cabinet and their able and persuasive assistants. So my conclusion is that $25,000,000 for the very proper purpose of building roads can be found by reasonable pruning of extravagant estimates and by exercise of reasonable economy by Congress in consideration of measures which involve large expenditures outside of the estimates and demands of the administration.

I believe the incorporation of these provisions of the Lever law, with such modifications as are necessary to accommodate them to this bill, will greatly improve it. But if the changes I suggest are not made, if the bill is urged for passage just as it is, I shall support it. I support it because I believe it is a step in the right direction; it is the beginning of a very proper effort on the part of the Federal Government to assist the States to carry on a most important and necessary work, a work which is very burdensome to the States and in which they sorely need the help the Government is abundantly able to give. This bill, enacted into law, will be a proper although a very tardy admission by the Congress of its duty to the country in a very important matter. The bill in its present form is faulty and the amount of money provided is small, but amendments can be made later and the amount of money can from time to time be increased to meet the needs and demands of the country. This law—when this bill is passed and becomes law—will, in my judgment, never be repealed, unless perhaps a better law involving this principle be enacted in its place; the policy herein declared and begun will never be abandoned.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I would not say anything on behalf of the committee in the way of criticism of this amendment, except that apparently it is intended to protect the Federal Government's interest, and I would not want any Member of this body to think that we would oppose any proper amendment that would safeguard some point overlooked by your committee. But I submit that this amendment is entirely superfluous and unnecessary. Why should the Secretary of Agriculture call upon the States to make reports showing what moneys they had received under this act, when that information was already primarily in the possession of the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. This is to call on them for a report as to how the money has been expended.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will answer that. No money can be paid out by the Department of Agriculture to a State, until that State has satisfied the Department of Agriculture, that it has completed a project, or partially completed a project, in conformity with the requirements of the department. Hence when the department makes a payment, that payment is not made with reference to future expenditures, but is a payment for work already done. As between the Department of Agriculture, and a State, the Department of Agriculture is always apprised by its own records of every dollar that has been expended in that State.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The Secretary of Agriculture is apprised as to the money that has been expended in the State, but this bill directs him by actual inspection of the work to know that the money has been properly expended.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly, and that provision is intended to safeguard the Federal interest. The Department of Agriculture in the discharge of its duty can not, and ought not, to expend a dollar under this bill, until it is thoroughly satisfied that the work arranged for has been done in absolute conformity with the requirements of the department. Hence, as I have said, the payment is not one for future expenditures, but is compensation for work already done, and already approved by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. If the gentleman will permit, my position is that it ought not to be necessary for the Secretary of Agriculture to send out a horde of inspectors to make actual inspection; that he ought to treat the highway authorities of a State as the Secretary of Agriculture treats the agricultural agents of a State in the matter of using the money under the Lever law. If he discovers later that the money has been improperly expended, he can withhold the next appropriation.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Why talk about withholding the funds, on the ground that money has been improperly expended, when the funds can not be primarily expended, unless a State has conformed to this law, and satisfied the Department of Agriculture that it has so conformed? Mr. Chairman, I submit that when our expenditures under this statute will be controlled by such definite requirements with respect to the conditions under which payments shall be made by the Department of Agriculture, there is no occasion to encumber this bill with the proposed amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McLAUGHLIN) there were—ayes 22, noes 59.

So the amendment was rejected.

[By unanimous consent leave was granted to Mr. HELGESEN, Mr. DYER, and Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin to extend their remarks in the RECORD.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

The question was taken and the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent to have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that has been adopted upon the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] has added to the bill the word "improvement" after the word "construction." I ask unanimous consent that, wherever the word "construction" appears in the bill, immediately following it shall be inserted the word "improvement," so that the phrase will read "construction, improvement, or maintenance," and that the word "improved" shall be written into the bill in all the sections immediately after the word "constructed."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that wherever in the bill the word "construction" appears the Clerk shall write the word "improvement," and where the word "constructed" appears the word "improved" shall be written in. Is there objection to this request?

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have no objection to having it inserted where this amendment was, but I think a request of that kind ought to be carefully prepared in advance and furnished to the Clerk, and not impose upon the Clerk the business of correcting a bill by reading it through to see where a certain amendment should go in.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Just as the gentleman prefers.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection. The gentleman can make his request later on, and I think nobody will have any objection to it if he specifies where the word should go in, so the Clerk will have something to guide him in making the correction.

The CHAIRMAN. The request for unanimous consent is withdrawn for the present.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out of line 9, page 4, the word "substantial."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 9, strike out the word "substantial."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That all construction and maintenance of roads under the provisions of this act shall be under the supervision and control of the State highway department of the several States: Provided, That until January 1, 1920, the amount which has been apportioned to be expended in any State which has no State highway department shall be available for expenditure in such State in such manner as shall be agreed upon by the Secretary of Agriculture and the governor of such State; that the Secretary of Agriculture may make, or cause to be made, such inspection and examinations of any road constructed or maintained under the provisions of this act as he shall deem necessary, and he may prescribe what reports shall be made to him by the State highway department of any State in relation to any road in such State to the construction or maintenance of which aid under the provisions of this act has been given or sought, when such reports shall be made, and the form and subject matter of the same; that the Secretary of Agriculture shall have power to employ such assistants, clerks, and other persons in the city of Washington and elsewhere, to purchase such materials and supplies, and to prescribe such rules and regulations for the administration of this act as he may consider expedient.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I had prepared an amendment upon this section providing for the striking out of the words beginning in line 4, after the word "State," down to and including the word "necessary," in line 8. I have not offered this amendment, and I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if, in his judgment, after this bill shall have been in operation and roads shall have been constructed under its provisions, it is the intention that there shall be a large number of men employed to go out and visit all sections of the United States to determine whether these roads have been built in accordance with the specifications of the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the interrogation of the gentleman from Illinois, I will say that it is not. I have talked the matter over with the Secretary of Agriculture and consulted him in drawing that particular part of it. He expressed to me the desire that the bill should be in such form that it would not call for any expensive increases of bureaucracy in his department, and we have concurred with him. We have put the construction and maintenance under the control of the State highway departments, and the whole thing is to be done by the State departments, subject to the Secretary of Agriculture being satisfied that the work has been done in compliance with the plans and specifications. In order to avoid the necessity of going into the State to do what the gentleman thinks we permit, it is provided that the Secretary of Agriculture has power to call upon the State highway departments for full reports as to what has been done in every particular road and to supply any other information which the Secretary of Agriculture may ask to have supplied, and nothing can be paid until he has done that.

In another part of the bill which the gentleman has not called attention to all of that is amply provided for and provided for the specific purpose of reducing the number of Federal employees. Twenty-two members of the committee, everyone of them, worked diligently to bring about the very result the gentleman wishes and desires, and I believe that no bill could be framed that will call for a smaller number of Federal employees than the bill which we now present to the House, and I think the committee prides itself that we have so successfully accomplished that result. If the Secretary of Agriculture wants to know what has been done as to a particular road he asks the State highway department to furnish that information, and if he is not well satisfied he can ask for more information. It does not call for an inspector to go there and get it; but, of course, if some State highway department shows a disposition to overreach the Government as to this appropriation, undoubtedly the Secretary of Agriculture would, and he should, send enough inspectors to investigate the methods of that particular highway department to see whether or not it was acting in good faith toward the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his explanation, and yet I realize that in the administration of laws many times there comes a request from a department that they must have so much money for the purpose of employing men and sending them out over the country, and I am frank to say to the gentleman that, so far as the State of Illinois is concerned—and I believe it is the same in other States of this country—it seems to me that the sworn statement of the local highway department, transmitted to the State highway commission and from there certified by the governor to the Secretary of Agriculture, should be sufficient. Now, I notice down in lines 15 and 16 it says that he shall have power to employ "such assistants, clerks, and others persons in the city of Washington and elsewhere."

I think that that might be cured by providing "as Congress may provide," so that no Secretary of Agriculture now or in the future may have an opportunity, or should have the chance, I will say, of selecting a large number of employees and sending them out over the country to examine every little piece of road that may be built under this bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I do.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Under the provisions of lines 14, 15, 16, 17, and 18, page 5, it is proposed to turn over several million dollars of public funds to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture for the employment of clerks and the purchase of material. In other words, he can hire as many clerks in the city of Washington and outside of the city of Washington as he pleases.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSTER. I offer this amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 17, after the word "supplies" insert the words "as Congress may provide."

Mr. FOSTER. I offer this, Mr. Chairman, as a limitation upon the Secretary of Agriculture in the employment of men.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If the gentleman will yield to me for a second, the committee makes no objection to that.

Mr. FOSTER. All right; I am willing.

Mr. MANN. What is that?

Mr. FOSTER. In line 17, after the word "supplies" add "as Congress may provide."

Mr. MANN. But what was the remark of the gentleman?

Mr. FOSTER. That there would be no objection.

Mr. MANN. I should think there would be a decided objection.

Mr. FOSTER. What I am trying to get at is, if I am unfortunate in not getting the right language——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Shall be provided for by "law" instead of provided for by "Congress."

Mr. FOSTER. I will modify the amendment and make it "by law."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to vote for this bill and have no desire to take any extra amount of time in perfecting it, but there would be no authority of law for Congress to provide anything of the kind, and, if they did, of course it would not be under this appropriation of $25,000,000. It might have been better, I think, to have provided that Congress should make specific appropriation for the officials employed by the Government and pay for it out of the Treasury, and, possibly, outside of the $25,000,000. But that has not been the scheme of the bill. The scheme of the bill is to have all officials paid for out of the $25,000,000 which is appropriated each year.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to my colleague that what I am trying to get here, and I believe the amendment would supply it, is to make the limitation upon the Secretary of Agriculture, whoever he may be.

Mr. MANN. But there would be no authority for inserting any items in the agricultural or other appropriation bill for these assistants. They would all go out on a point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. That should be made in the appropriation for this money for the good roads. Here is the authority.

Mr. MANN. Very well, the law would authorize the appropriation of $25,000,000 for the good roads. Now, if I am not taking too much of the time——

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN (continuing). As a matter of practice and under the law, when they make an estimate for this money, and they would be required every year to make an estimate, the department, under the law, would be required to put into the estimate the amount of money they expected to spend for clerk hire and other assistants in the way of officials, and also report how much had been expended in the previous fiscal year, and the Committee on Appropriations would have that before them. It is very likely that the Committee on Appropriations would bring in, as it would have a right to do, a limitation in the appropriation as to how much of this could be used for these services. That limitation would be in order, because it would be a limitation on the appropriation bill and the committee would have the figures before it from the department, both as to how much had been expended the previous year and how much the department was considering expending for the next fiscal year. But under the gentleman's amendment there would be no authority to insert an appropriation in the bill for these clerical assistants or other assistants, and the "gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MANN," or some other gentleman who watches appropriation bills, would make a point of order on it and it would go out, and we would have $25,000,000 a year to spend and no way of expending it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have more time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] wish to proceed for three minutes additional?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that they change the word by inserting "as may be provided by law."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 17 after the word "supplies" the words "as may be provided by law."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, now there is no provision of law, except this bill, on the subject.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman when Congress passes an appropriation bill that furnishes the law.

Mr. MANN. Surely. When the Congress has passed the appropriation bill that furnishes the law, but during the operation of passing an appropriation bill we can not insert an item over a point of order in the House unless it is already authorized by law previous to the passage of the appropriation bill. I think that the gentleman's amendment would simply mean that where you say that these things can be done they will not be done unless you say they can be done. But what we are doing in the bill is saying that they can be done.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it puts a limitation on the Secretary of Agriculture to do that.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentlemen agree on what ought to be done, but do not agree upon the effect.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we are willing to risk that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 5.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to extend my remarks in order to discuss more fully this bill, and I do not wish to take time for it now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 24, after the word "State," strike out the remainder of line 24 and all of line 25, on page 4; also strike out all of lines 1, 2, and 3, on page 5, and all of line 4 up to the word "that" on said page.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, the effect of the proposed amendment would be to remove the apparent requirement that is being made on the different States to establish highway departments or commissions. The theory of this bill is that the United States Government shall treat with the States, first, through a highway department, if there be one. If there be no highway department established, then through the governor of the State. The effect of this bill, and especially that portion of it which I seek to have stricken out, would be to require a State, entitled to its apportionment of these funds from year to year, to go into the commission form of government by establishing departments, which some States in this Union do not particularly favor. It simply amounts to a means of coercion by the Federal Government; it says in effect that these States shall have a commission on highways or a highway department, which is not usually a representative department.

The governor is an officer elected by the people in every State, I presume, and directly responsible to the people, and he is the proper officer to deal with, unless the State itself sees fit to establish a highway commission. We guarantee through the Constitution a republican form of government to the States.

We will not abide a State departing from it. But here is a method and means for giving, at least in part, a government not elective, not responsible to the people, but a commission appointive, and only indirectly responsible to the people. I think it is an unwarranted power, or an unwarranted use of power, at least, to limit the time within which the Secretary of Agriculture should treat with the governor of a State. If we leave it this way, after the lapse of four years the State which has no highway department would not be entitled to receive the benefits of this bill or of the moneys that would be given to the State under this bill from the Federal Government. I say, therefore, the effect of this amendment would be simply to leave it as it is now, for the department to deal with the highway department or governor of the State, whichever the sovereign will of the State should elect.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the argument of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN], I will say that at the present time all the States of the Union have highway departments except eight. A few years ago only a very few of the States had highway departments, but it has been demonstrated beyond any question that the State that is interested in highway improvement and is making any progress in highway improvement establishes as one of the first steps to road improvement a State highway department. The highway department then engages a competent highway engineer.

A great many gentlemen have criticized this bill because it did not provide that a State shall be required to have a highway commission in the first instance before any aid was given. But this bill provides that by the year 1920 each State receiving aid shall have a highway department. I think this requirement is a very essential thing for obtaining good roads in a State, and it is very essential that the State should have a highway department in order to insure the proper use of its own road fund as well as the funds given to it by the Federal Government.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Is it not the purpose of this provision to force every State in the Union to have a highway commission?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Does the gentleman think the Government of the United States should force a phase of government upon any State which is not republican and representative in character?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I will say to the gentleman that this is following the precedent of the Department of Agriculture in making the localities receiving aid comply with certain requirements, such as paying part of the salaries of agricultural agents. There is a provision in the agricultural bill that we passed at the last session of Congress which requires the States to do certain things before they can get any of that fund. It is necessary in order to get a State out of the old rut that it has been in for years, in order to insure the proper application and investment of funds appropriated by the Federal Government, to establish certain Government machinery for that purpose, and in this case, in order that the roads should be built in an intelligent manner, it is necessary to require them to have a highway department.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman again yield?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. In the law that the gentleman cites is it required that any State shall have any particular department of government that it has not already got?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. It makes the distribution of the funds appropriated by the Federal Government contingent upon the State doing certain things, and it provides that the State agricultural colleges shall do certain things before they can get the money apportioned to them.

Mr. SLOAN. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with particular attention to the arguments of gentlemen favoring this bill, because circumstances over which I had no control debarred me from the benefit of the debate on a similar bill that passed this House last year. I find with much regret that I am unable to support this bill as it stands and at this time.

I recognize that there are no politics in this measure. I recognize, too, that there is no geography or sectionalism in it. Certainly there ought not to be. Merely because a Member lives in a district which will derive no direct benefit from the bill is no excuse whatever for his voting against it, if, in his judgment, it will be for the benefit of the country at large. Personally, I am as much in favor of good roads in the country as any gentleman who favors this bill. I am as much in favor of legislation which may be for the benefit of farmers as any man in this House, I think. Certainly I am willing to go further than many, because I am willing to give the farmer not only good roads but adequate protection on everything that he raises on his farm. Upon due consideration I do not believe that this bill will at all provide the benefits its proponents seem to believe. But, at any rate, this is not a time, in my judgment, gentlemen, to pass this legislation. The condition of the Treasury is such that I do not think we can go ahead with reckless expeditures, even for worthy purposes. I call the attention of this House to the Treasury situation as it stands to-day. I hold in my hand the Treasury report of January 22, which is the last issued, and in it I find that there is, according to the new method of accounting, $102,000,000 cash balance in the Treasury.

Now, let us see how much of that we can draw on to pay the expenses of the $25,000,000 appropriation which will come if this bill passes. I find that in that $102,000,000 is included $53,000,000 of funds in the hands of disbursing officers. You can not draw on that. I find that there is subsidiary silver coin amounting to $21,000,000. You can not draw on that. I find that there is minor coin amounting to nearly two millions. You can not draw on that. I find that there is silver bullion to the value of about $6,000,000. You can not draw on that. I find that there are deposits in the Philippine treasury of over $6,000,000. You can not draw on that. And when you add up these various items you arrive at the situation that there is to-day in the United States Treasury less than $13,000,000 available cash balance, even figured in the most liberal possible way.

Permit me also to call your attention to the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations the other day. He made this remark, and it is significant, gentlemen. I asked the gentleman from New York what the balance in the Treasury would be if all debts now due were paid, and the gentleman from New York replied:

> The country would be bankrupt if we paid all the obligations from public funds.

The situation is simply this, that if you are to pay out $25,000,000 a year, you must provide a new form of taxation to do it, and any man who votes in favor of this bill must be willing to advocate some new form of taxation, probably a stamp tax, which was well described by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as being the most odious form of taxation.

I am fearful also, Mr. Chairman, that if you pass this bill it may be used by opponents of preparedness to prevent adequate expenditures for that purpose by this Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I have two minutes more, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I do not like to object, but I should like to see if we can have some agreement as to limiting debate on this section?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I merely want to complete my statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. As I say, Mr. Chairman, I am fearful that this may be used by gentlemen who are opposed to any increase in the Army and Navy this year by making it appear that we shall be compelled to resort to additional forms of taxation to raise even this money. Personally I am in favor of that degree of preparedness described in the patriotic and eloquent speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] this morning, a preparedness not only to resist invasion of our shores, but adequate also to protect every American citizen in his life and property wherever he may be. [Applause.] I am not willing at this time to risk the failure of adequate appropriations for preparedness because of this expenditure, therefore I am constrained to vote against this bill at the present time and in its present shape.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. With great reluctance?

Mr. LONGWORTH. With great reluctance.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section close in five minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. I have a couple of amendments that I desire to present.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Then I will ask that debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes—one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] and the other half by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes—one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] and the other half by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE].

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, when I find the proponents of preparedness here opposing everything that goes to the protection of the people in the rural communities I am very much interested. I am interested in everything that they say and print in the RECORD. I am also interested in some of the things that they do not say. When the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] made his remarks as to his interest in the protection of that which the farmer raises, I am sure it was merely a slip of his mind that he forgot to state that he was also in favor of the same degree of protection for that which the farmer buys; and that, as a matter of fact, he knows that very little of the protection that he would put upon the country would be real protection to the farmer, and that the system of protection which he proposes would add enormously to the burden of the farmer's cost of living.

Since I have been a Member of this House I do not think I have ever cast a ballot against a reasonable degree of expenditures or any expenditures for the Army and Navy, and, in common with others here, I feel that the time has now come in the history of this country when a reasonable preparedness ought to be brought about in order that this country may maintain the position which it is entitled to occupy in international affairs. I do not care how it is necessary to raise the money, if we get the results for the people to which they are entitled. My own belief is that, if it is necessary, we ought to sell the bonds that are now in the Treasury and issue a new set of bonds in order to protect the people at home and in order to protect this country against other nations.

But, Mr. Chairman, whenever we take up a discussion in favor of good roads, some gentlemen say there is "pork" in it. If we discuss anything that increases transportation facilities, either by way of good roads or by river and harbor bills, some gentlemen say there is "pork" in it. If an effort is made here on the part of this Government to give governmental aid to rural credit, some gentlemen call it paternalism, but if it is for an appropriation that goes anywhere except in rural communities, then the man who proposes it is a wise and patriotic statesman, and it is a good form of government which carries it out.

I want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts and others along the eastern coast who have been opposing this legislation, that the people of the South realize that practically every one of the munition factories is located between Norfolk and Maine. We realize that the population and wealth of this country are to be found there. We realize that below Norfolk there will be no attack on this country in all probability by any foreign power. We learn also from the experts of the Army and Navy that we do not need anything to protect the portion of the country south of Virginia. But coming here from the South, with our loyalty to this Government unquestioned, the people of the South want to stand behind this Government and occupy a place in it, and we ask but a small share of the appropriations. We are coming here asking in this bill that we be given some small measure of that to which we are entitled; and every gentleman here knows that for the past half century the South has been taxed far beyond what she has received from this Government. Under these conditions, Mr. Chairman, I hope that this House will enact some kind of a good roads bill at this session. I am ready to vote for it. I do not say this is the best bill that could be passed, but I say almost any bill that gives us better roads, almost any bill that gives us a better rural credit system, almost any bill that lightens the burdens carried because of bad roads and high rates of interest paid by the farmers will better the conditions under which the farmers of this country are now forced to live. [Applause.]

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 18, after the word "expedient," insert "Provided, That on payment to any State of any sum for the purposes herein set forth the same shall be made upon condition that should the State fail, neglect, or refuse to maintain in good order and condition the roads established through such national aid, said State should forfeit to the United States a sum equal to 3 per cent per annum upon the amount of money contributed by the United States for the same."

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is submitted, believing that this Government work is not done and responsibility to itself is not complete when it gives to a State enough money to complete the highways indicated, whether that of a post road, interstate highway, or a military road. Under this bill the State immediately after the completion of a road can relocate the road, dislocate it or terminate its existence, and there is no recourse whatever provided for the Government. So I submit that it is our duty to the country which we profess to represent to see that this money shall be paid to the State highway department only upon condition that if the State fails, neglects, or refuses to maintain the road for the purposes for which it was constructed, then for every year it shall so fail, neglect, or refuse it shall forfeit from the funds that may at any time be due from the Government to the State 3 per cent of the amount the Government had contributed to the construction of the road so allowed to go into disuse.

I know that in the discussion of some of these matters amendments are not very well received from this side of the House, and yet I am gratified to say that a number of criticisms that I have presented, although meeting with a storm of opposition at first, have entered into the bill, and so I offer this in absolute good faith, believing that the Government should not appropriate these sums to the State without having some recourse on the State to compel its carrying out the purpose for which the investment was made. We have the power because we have the money; we can withhold the money until the State agrees to maintain the road which was so constructed. If it fails, we can readily collect by withholding it. The zeal with which the State's interests in this bill are being looked after and the apparent overlooking of the Federal rights makes Congressmen appear more like legislators for the State, seizing the funds of the Government and distributing it as treasure trove, brigand loot. The Government is to give money in princely sums to build roads over which the United States mail may be carried, interstate commerce pass, or Government troops may pass. But with the expenditure of the money and the completion of the work the Government can not force the continuance or maintenance of the road one day for any of these purposes. The money is gone; there is no recourse. The State is playing the part of the Lothario who enjoys unrestrained companionship without the fetters of matrimony and under no accountability for the usual responsibilities arising thereunder.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, add to section 4 the following: "Provided, That should any dispute arise between the highway authorities of any State and the Secretary of Agriculture relative to the findings, acts, or doings of the Secretary of Agriculture under this act an appeal may be had to the President of the United States upon the record made by the parties to said dispute or upon additional evidence and hearing which the President may, in his discretion, demand."

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to submit this for the purpose of taking from the Secretary of Agriculture the final word on the last proposition that may be involved between the Secretary of Agriculture and the representatives of the State.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. I will.

Mr. BORLAND. Would not the gentleman refer it to The Hague tribunal for arbitration?

Mr. SLOAN. No; I would not refer it to The Hague tribunal, I would refer it to the gentleman from Kansas City.

Mr. MANN. That would be the same thing; both will be dead tribunals in the next Congress. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read section 5, as follows:

SEC. 5. That the necessary culverts and bridges shall be considered as parts of the roads constructed or maintained under the provisions of this act; that the roads which may be constructed or maintained under the provisions of this act shall include earth, sand-clay, sand-gravel, and other common types of roads, as well as roads of higher classes, one of the purposes of this act being to encourage and promote the improvement of a general system of roads leading from cities, towns, and railway stations into the adjacent farming communities.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out at the beginning of section 5 the following language:

"That the necessary culverts and bridges shall be considered as parts of the roads constructed or maintained under the provisions of this act."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with patience and care to the discussion on the merits of this measure, which has been under debate in this House, sitting in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, during the past five days.

I should not again project myself into the debate, nor again seek to justify my action in presenting minority views on this measure, were it not for the fact that the proponents of the bill seem to have assumed that I am opposed to good roads, and that the sentiment of Massachusetts is contrary to the position taken by those who contend that well-built and carefully maintained roads are of decided benefit to any community—local, State, or National.

They do not really believe that, Mr. Chairman, for they know full well, or if they do not know they ought to know, or if they care to know they can easily ascertain, that the glorious old Commonwealth of Massachusetts has, since 1892, been engaged in highway construction along State-aid lines, and has built many miles of the best and most modern highways in the entire country, and has maintained them, and beyond this has educated the people in the numerous rural and suburban sections up to a high standard of highway construction and maintenance which has led to wise and economical expenditure of county and town appropriations.

These attacks on Massachusetts, these sneers and jibes at the Members from the Bay State, how weak and ineffectual they are, Mr. Chairman, and somewhat unseemly, too. Massachusetts has become accustomed to that, and we fully appreciate that success, prosperity, and contentment in the State as well as in the individual are wont to provoke envy and jealousy in the minds of those representing less enlightened and less advanced sections of the Union.

We have listened to the enunciation of the doctrine here on the floor of the House, apparently advanced with seriousness, that because the citizens of one section of the country have built up successful and prospering mercantile and manufacturing establishments in one part of the Nation, therefore they must be assessed more than their just and proportionate share of the expense of Federal activity in other parts of the Nation.

To pay this bill direct taxation must necessarily be resorted to in the present condition of the Federal Treasury, and direct taxation of the most obnoxious character must be imposed on the long-suffering public; that is, by stamp taxes.

Of the fifty-two millions raised by the emergency revenue tax during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, the State of Massachusetts contributed over two millions, and the States of Connecticut, Illinois, Indiana, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania paid thirty-one millions, and a like proportion of the sum appropriated by this bill will be contributed by these same States.

The following table sets forth in more detail the information as to "who pays the freight":

Let me also direct your attention to the attitude, with reference to this bill, assumed by one of the country's greatest newspapers, the New York Sun, as set forth in the editorial columns of its issue of the 25th instant:

A PROPOSED MONSTROUS PERVERSION OF LEGISLATIVE POWER.

The Shackleford so-called good-roads bill now before the House of the Congress is so preposterous in its purpose, so childish in its provisions to carry out its purpose, it has not seemed deserving of other than the casual and light treatment it has received, so far as we have observed, from the press of those States upon which the bill seeks to levy a tax of $25,000,000 annually for the benefit of States unwilling to improve their own roads at their own expense. It seemed fair to assume that so frank an attempt to hold up the National Treasury, to strip it of a sum in excess of one-half of the funds now available to meet the current expenses of Government, would be laughed out of the House. There are indications that such an assumption rested on faith unjustified.

The bill is drawn with cunning use of words designed to conceal its ugliness. There is soothing patter of "reasonable cost," of Federal supervision, of encouragement of roads "leading from cities, towns, and railway stations into the adjacent farming communities" to aid in the conduct of the Postal Service.

Here, baldly, is what the bill authorizes: An appropriation annually of $25,000,000 for the construction and maintenance of rural roads. Out of this sum $65,000 is to be allotted to each State. Out of the remainder the Secretary of Agriculture is to allot his department such a sum as he "shall deem necessary to defray the expenses of his department in the administration of this act," and the remainder after such deduction shall be distributed to the States, "one half in the ratio which the population of each State bears to the population of all the States * * * and the other half of such remainder in the ratio which the mileage of Rural Free Delivery and star mail routes in each State bears" to the same mileage in all the States.

This language is, of course, designed to create the impression that here is something which would improve rural free delivery, which, by the way, cost the Government $49,000,000 last year. But a little further examination shows what is the real purpose of the bill. In its first section it is provided "that for the purpose of this act the term 'rural post roads' shall be held to mean any public road over which rural mail is or might be carried."

In other words, all rural roads are to be built and maintained largely at Federal expense. And away down in the last section of the bill is found this precious supplement to the "or might be" provision: "That the necessary culverts and bridges shall be considered as parts of the roads constructed or maintained under provisions of this act."

There you are. No longer need the supervisors of Wayback County face the horrid thought of taxing Waybackers for a bridge over Purling Creek. Uncle Sam will build it.

During the debate in the House on this bill Mr. MADDEN, of Illinois, and other gentlemen unafraid were eager to learn something about the whyfore of that initial gift of $65,000 to each State. Their curiosity remained unsatisfied. The contemplated roads are to be of "earth, sand clay, sand gravel, or other type," and the Secretary of Agriculture is to determine what part of the cost Uncle Sam shall pay, but it must not be less than 30 nor more than 50 per cent.

How beautifully the proposed allotment of the first year's appropriation works out these few comparisons reveal: In 1913 Alabama spent for State highways $127,000, and under the allotment would receive $579,000; Georgia spent nothing and would receive $722,000; while California, which spent $2,000,000, would get less, $504,000. Florida spent nothing and would get $202,000, but Connecticut, which spent $3,483,000, would get $258,000, to encourage her in well-doing.

Representative SHACKLEFORD is from Missouri. That State, according to a table prepared by the Department of Agriculture, has expended for State highways $1,421,983. Connecticut has spent $14,934,176; Massachusetts, $16,365,425; New Jersey, $7,192,268; Pennsylvania, $24,259,954; New York, $82,638,729. These States, with a few others which have spent their own money liberally for good roads, will be taxed for the greater part, much the greater, of this annual gift of $25,000,000 to States which tax themselves little or nothing for roads.

We hope for its own reputation that the House will not pass this bill. If it does, we believe it will die in the Senate. Should it not, we are confined to the hope that an attempt to exercise so monstrous a perversion of legislative power will not receive the approval of President Wilson.

Let me, in conclusion, recall the words of the distinguished Member from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] when, in referring to the failure of his own State to pay its share of the expenses incurred in eradicating the foot-and-mouth disease among cattle, the United States having contributed its portion of the cost, he spoke the other day as follows:

Now, what does that mean? It means that all the time the States are talking about rights and are ignoring duties, they are trying to unload upon Uncle Sam the burden of taking care of things which primarily belong to them [the States] to take care of.

How apt this utterance, and how well it fits the present attempt to shift onto the National Government a duty which many States have made no attempt, even, to fulfill.

I again direct your attention to the statements set forth in the report filed by me, and submit that none of these arguments have been successfully controverted:

[H. Rept. 26, pt. 2, 64th Cong., 1st sess.]

RURAL POST ROADS.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Roads, submitted the following minority views (to accompany H. R. 7617):

I am unable to concur with my colleagues on the committee reporting this bill, and respectfully submit herein my views on the proposed legislation appertaining to this important problem.

I do not believe that the Federal Government should invest itself with the responsibilities and liabilities coincident with the business of road construction and maintenance.

I am opposed to appropriating the sum named for any such purpose, especially at this time, when there are other matters of more pressing importance, and requiring the appropriation of large sums of money, pending.

The condition of the Federal Treasury at present is not such as to warrant appropriating any such amount for a purpose entirely new, under a scheme entirely novel in its details and scope. In view of such condition and because it has been necessary to resort to emergency taxation, which has been continued until December 31, 1916, I am of opinion that this proposed legislation can well be deferred until some future time, when our finances are in condition to warrant such an outlay.

Many States have already expended millions of dollars in the construction of roads suitable for all classes of highway traffic, and they should not now be called upon to contribute toward the construction of highways in foreign jurisdictions which have neglected this vital duty.

It should be noted also that the States which now have the more improved systems of highways will contribute the larger share to the project sought to be enacted into law by this measure.

The States of Connecticut, Massachusets, New York, New Jersey, Ohio, and Pennsylvania will pay into the Federal Treasury the larger proportion of the sum appropriated in this measure, and will receive in some cases less than one-quarter the amount paid in, while other States will receive relatively twice as much as they contribute to the Federal Treasury.

I can not agree with the definition of "rural post road," as set out in section 1.

I am opposed to the method of apportionment as proposed in section 2, and desire to direct attention to the fact that no allowance is made for that part of the population of the several States which live in the cities and thickly settled centers and which are not served by rural free delivery.

The discrepancies in the apportionment are in many instances glaring, for example:

Colorado, with a population of but 799,024, is allotted $252,168; Oregon, with 672,765 inhabitants, is allotted $248,792; North and South Dakota, each with a few thousands less than 600,000 inhabitants, are allotted $325,372 and $337,406, respectively; while Connecticut, with a population of 1,114,756, is entitled to but $258,638.

Turning to the mileage of rural free delivery and star routes, a similar discrepancy attains:

Louisiana, having 0.75 per cent of total mileage of these routes, is allotted $345,064; yet West Virginia, with 1.19 per cent of total mileage, receives but $340,688, and Montana, having 0.76 per cent of total route mileage, is apportioned but $192,998.

The views of my colleagues on the committee set forth that primarily it is the duty of the State to provide roads for the people, and it is respectfully contended that failure on the part of the State to perform its duty does not transfer that duty to the Federal Government.

It is also contended by the committee that the General Government has consitutional power to construct and maintain "post roads."

Assuming, but not admitting, this to be true, it is usually the practice, when the General Government erects, builds, or takes over any utility of commerce, manufacture, or agriculture that it likewise retains jurisdiction over it, while this bill expressly precludes the proper exercise of Government jurisdiction over a Government utility.

It will be claimed that because the Federal Government may justly contribute toward the construction and improvement of that which it utilizes, i. e., highways, in exercising its important function of mail transportation and delivery, that it ought to pay a part of the cost of the construction of such highways.

If this be the object sought, then certainly the share of the expense which the United States Government is required to pay should be in proportion to the use made by it of the highways, taking into consideration all the uses to which said highways are put.

To enact this legislation on the shallow pretext set forth would be to commit the Federal Government to a policy which would lead to enormous expenditures in the future, with but little benefit to the people as a whole, and it will lead to demands in the future from States which in the past have shamefully disregarded the duty owed the people within their borders that the United States bear the whole expense of road construction and maintenance.

It will discourage rather than encourage road construction under State auspices and will open wide the door for quibbling, criticism, and experimentation, all at the expense, in large measure, of States which have expended their own money for their own internal improvements.

This legislation in its present form, and in the absence of any provision for repayment to the Federal Government of a portion, at least, of the moneys expended, to my mind, is a piece of governmental paternalism which I can not favor.

Respectfully submitted.

JOSEPH WALSH.

It is sought by those representing States hungry for a share of Federal funds to place Massachusetts upon an equal footing with the other States in the matter of apportionment, but to discriminate against her in the matter of taxation, by way of direct taxes which will be levied to provide this appropriation, and to allow her no credit for the millions she has spent in the past from money raised by taxes levied upon her own people, which taxes have been cheerfully paid, and which funds have been wisely expended, in constructing a system of highways which well may be termed the standard of the Nation.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to a good part of the debate on this bill and have read quite a number of the speeches.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to me for a minute?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendment thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, this bill has been discussed with great ability and much earnestness. I have been wondering how able men can differ so widely upon a simple proposition like this. No one is to be criticized for his views on this or any other matter. We must assume that all are honest in their views. I have voted for every road bill that has been presented to this House since I have been a Member of it. This is the third bill that has been before the House since I came here. I shall vote for this bill. [Applause.] I can not now add materially to the discussion that has already taken place. Of course I believe that agriculture is our fundamental industry. I believe it is the duty of the National Government in every way possible to encourage that great industry. I believe the Federal Government should aid the States in building good roads. We do not do this as a gift to our farmers. But if we build good roads we do it on broad general grounds, that by so doing we strengthen the great Government of which we are proud to be citizens.

This bill provides that not to exceed $25,000,000 annually shall be appropriated, to be distributed among the States, to encourage the building of good roads. The State, to participate in this fund, must contribute an amount equal to that which it receives from the National Government. Under the provisions of this bill, Oklahoma would receive annually from the National Treasury something over $500,000. This would not build many miles of public highways. It would, however, be an encouragement and an incentive for our people to improve the character of our roads. In other words, this money would promote good road building. The National Government can not undertake to build roads for the States; it can, in view of the importance of good roads and their value to the Nation, take funds from the National Treasury as a means to insure greater activity in building good roads in the various States of the Union. I have been surprised that many of the Members of this House representing the great cities of the country have opposed this bill with vigor and ardor. No doubt they, in a large measure, represent the views of the majority of the people whom they represent; no doubt, too, they express their own honest convictions. I regret, however, that on this proposition there should seem to be an antagonism of interests between the city and the country. There is nothing more certain than that the country and city are really identical in interests. The city can not impoverish the country without in the long run impoverishing itself; the country can not grow and prosper without contributing bountifully to the wealth and development of the city. A proposition that means agricultural growth means commercial and industrial expansion. The country and the city are bound together by indissoluble ties which we can not break by either our speeches or our votes.

Some have insisted that national funds should be used only to build great interstate highways; yet we must remember that the flag floats over the most remote highway of this country.

The Constitution may not follow the flag, but the benefit of national appropriations should extend to every foot of soil over which the flag floats.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 23, after the comma following the word "earth," insert the word "earth-oiled," followed by a comma.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to take up the time of the committee, as I believe this amendment will be adopted unanimously. I have taken the matter up with the chairman of the committee, and I believe the members of the committee are favorably inclined toward this small amendment.

I wish to say one or two words in favor of the oiled road, which is not, as a matter of fact, recognized in this bill. I was very sorry the other day to have the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] attack the Illinois roads without any notice whatever when I was sitting beside him assisting him, so far as I could, in the passage of this bill. We admit that perhaps in certain parts of Illinois the roads are not up to what they ought to be, and I will concede to the gentleman the fact that he has good roads in Indiana, that he has a reasonable amount of blue sky in Indiana. He made one remark to the effect that more people in the United States cross the State of Indiana than any other State in the Union. I also concede that to be absolutely true. They always cross, but they seldom stop in Indiana. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, had the gentleman traveled in my section of the State over that thick black dirt—12 inches thick—that God Almighty placed there for the purpose of giving the people on the sand hills of Indiana something to eat, he would not have made the statement. There we used oil in the first place merely for laying the dust, but it was soon discovered that by treating the road properly, by putting a coat of oil on in the spring and again in the fall, and perhaps once after that, that we had what is absolutely a permanent road. Oil not only lays the dust, but it forms a foundation that is superior for the travel of wagons and automobiles. Therefore I trust that in view of the fact that all of the other amendments having been voted down, this one will be adopted without opposition. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That this act shall be in force from and after its passage.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 7. It is absolutely superfluous.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend on page 6 by striking out lines 8 and 9.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that it go out of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all of section 7 may be stricken from the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to the various sections in the bill where the phrase "construction or maintenance" occurs, except where the word "improvement" has already been inserted by amendment, and to insert after the word "construction" the word "improvement," and wherever the phrase "constructed or maintained" occurs to insert after the word "constructed" the word "improved," and I ask that the Clerk report those various places, which I have marked in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to return to certain portions of the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "construction," on page 1, insert the word "improvement" in the amendment.

Page 4, line 2, after the word "construction," insert the word "improvement"; line 5, after the word "construction," insert the word "improvement"; line 8, after the word "construction," insert the word "improvement"; line 14, after the word "construction," insert the word "improvement"; line 16, after the word "construction," insert the word "improvement"; line 20, after the word "construction," insert the word "improvement"; line 21, after the word "construction," insert the word "improvement."

Page 5, line 6, after the word "constructed," insert the word "improved"; line 11, after the word "construction," insert the word "improvement"; line 20, after the word "constructed," insert the word "improved"; line 22, after the word "constructed," insert the word "improved."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to return to the bill for the purpose of offering the amendments referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill as amended to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUCKER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 7617, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments to final passage. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object to unanimous consent on the previous question at any time.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The motion was agreed to and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was read the third time.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Alabama rise?

Mr. HEFLIN. This vote is on the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like to have a roll call and have a yea-and-nay vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 283, nays 81, answered "present" 3, not voting 67, as follows:

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw my vote of "nay" and answer "present," having a pair with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide that, in order to promote agriculture, afford better facilities for rural transportation and marketing farm products, and encourage the development of a general system of improved highways, the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, shall in certain cases aid the States in the construction, improvement, and maintenance of roads which may be used in the transportation of interstate commerce, military supplies, or postal matters."

On motion of Mr. SHACKLEFORD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. On this bill?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that all Members shall have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Ohio, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of H. R. 7728, Sixty-second Congress, first session, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for two days on account of illness in his family.

THE PRINTING BILL.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 8664, known as the printing bill, be given privileged status, with one hour's general debate, subject to preference being given to consideration of appropriation, revenue, and regularly privileged bills, and with the definite agreement that while this bill is being considered it may be displaced at any time for the consideration of any of the aforesaid bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 8664, usually known as the printing bill, shall be given privileged status, subject to appropriation bills and other privileged matters, and that the general debate on it be confined to one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, what is the object in the request in saying that there is a definite agreement that the bill may be displaced by certain other bills when a previous part of the agreement has said that the privileged status is subject to other bills?

Mr. BARNHART. That is a form of emphasis used in Indiana that is not common in Chicago. It is so as to make it clear.

Mr. MANN. It may be used in Indiana, but it would not be in any other civilized portion of the world. That is an agreement that would compel the House against its wish to take up an appropriation bill when it did not want to, which under the rules of the House ought not to be entered into.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not include that.

Mr. MANN. But I want it eliminated, so that there will be no question about it.

Mr. BARNHART. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that this language was submitted to a former parliamentarian of the House, and that was the language in which it was prepared. The purpose of it was to make it clear what this unanimous consent is; and I might explain the purpose is that the bill will not get in the way of any appropriation, revenue, or any privileged bill. When the House has not anything to do we can proceed with the consideration of this bill.

Mr. MANN. There are no privileged bills, practically, except revenue bills, appropriation bills, the reports of the Committees on Accounts, Rules, and so forth. However, the latter does not report bills. I suppose this bill would be a pretty good bill to occupy the rest of the session when we are not considering appropriation bills. I do not think I will object. I think we can make very good use of this bill to head off the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] and various other gentlemen who have administrative measures that they want passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from South Carolina rise?

Mr. LEVER. I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. We have not gotten through with this other one yet.

Mr. LEVER. I understood the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear him if he did. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] object?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do object.

The SPEAKER. That ends it.

THE WAREHOUSE BILL.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that House bill 9419, known as the warehouse bill, be given a privileged status, with two hours' general debate, subject to the preference being given to appropriation and revenue bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] asks unanimous consent that the warehouse bill be given a privileged status, with two hours' general debate, subject to the conditions imposed as to privileged bills. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the taking up of the bills mentioned by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART]. I do not know when we are going to have an appropriation bill. It looks as though we would not have any this session until after the fiscal year has expired. [Laughter.] Some gentlemen on this side of the House still would like to be heard in general debate, and we would like to have a little more time on general debate on some bills.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Speaker, that I am quite willing to modify my request so as to reach an agreement as to the time for general debate. I had hoped that we might be able to get this bill on the floor on Thursday of this week, and if so, if the gentleman would suggest the amount of general debate he would like to have, I think we could easily agree about that before submitting the final request.

Mr. MANN. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I would be willing to agree on three hours' debate on this side.

Mr. LEVER. I modify my request, Mr. Speaker, and ask for three hours' general debate instead of two hours. Make it two hours on a side.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. We have to have some time for general debate.

Mr. LEVER. Then I suggest to the gentleman that we make it five hours, he to have three hours on his side and we two hours.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the warehouse bill, H. R. 9419, be given a privileged status, with five hours' general debate, two hours for the proponents of the bill and three hours for the opposition to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] asks unanimous consent that the warehouse bill be given a privileged status, not to interfere with privileged bills and appropriation bills, and that the general debate thereon be limited to five hours, two hours to be controlled by himself and three hours by the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

The SPEAKER. From Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN]. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object, Mr. Speaker. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects, and moves that the House do now adjourn.

INCOME-TAX DECISION.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the opinion of the Supreme Court on what is known as the income-tax cases be made a House document, and that 25,000 copies be printed and placed in the folding room to the credit of Members.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] asks unanimous consent that the decision of the Supreme Court in the income tax cases, recently delivered, be made a House document and 25,000 copies printed, to be placed in the folding room to the credit of the Members. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection whatever to having the act done or as to the number of copies to be printed; but I think a matter of this sort ought to have been introduced this morning as a resolution and referred to the Committee on Printing, so that if it were deemed desirable it could have brought in a report this evening, being privileged, and had it considered. I shall object to all requests of this sort that are not submitted to the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection for a moment?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that there were so many urgent requests for copies of this decision that I took the matter up with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART], and he inquired of the Printing Office as to the cost of printing the document, and ascertained that it would be a little less than $200 for printing the number named, and owing to the urgent demand on the part of many Members for copies of this decision I felt constrained to submit this request.

Mr. MANN. I think it will not make any difference as to the time when they would be printed.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois adhere to his objection?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the decision to which I have referred.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by printing the decision of the Supreme Court referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I shall not object to the request. I think that is perfectly proper. I think that there ought to be a House document and a Senate document printed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the decision referred to:

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

(No. 140. October Term, 1915.)

FRANK R. BRUSHABER, APPELLANT, V. UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD CO. APPEAL FROM THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

(Jan. 24, 1916.)

Mr. Chief Justice White delivered the opinion of the court.

"As a stockholder of the Union Pacific Railroad Co. the appellant filed his bill to enjoin the corporation from complying with the income-tax provisions of the tariff act of October 3, 1913 (Sec. II, ch. 16, 38 Stat., 166). Because of constitutional questions duly arising the case is here on direct appeal from a decree sustaining a motion to dismiss because no ground for relief was stated.

"The right to prevent the corporation from returning and paying the tax was based upon many averments as to the repugnancy of the statute to the Constitution of the United States, of the peculiar relation of the corporation to the stockholders and their particular interests resulting from any of the administrative provisions of the assailed act, of the confusion, wrong, and multiplicity of suits and the absence of all means of redress which would result if the corporation paid the tax and complied with the act in other respects without protest, as it was alleged it was its intention to do. To put out of the way a question of jurisdiction we at once say that in view of these averments and the ruling in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S., 429), sustaining the right of a stockholder to sue to restrain a corporation under proper averments from voluntarily paying a tax charged to be unconstitutional on the ground that to permit such a suit did not violate the prohibitions of section 3224, Revised Statutes, against enjoining the enforcement of taxes, we are of opinion that the contention here made that there was no jurisdiction of the cause since to entertain it would violate the provisions of the Revised Statutes referred to is without merit. Before coming to dispose of the case on the merits, however, we observe that the defendant corporation having called the attention of the Government to the pendency of the cause and the nature of the controversy and its unwillingness to voluntarily refuse to comply with the act assailed, the United States as amicus curiæ has at bar been heard both orally and by brief for the purpose of sustaining the decree.

"Aside from averments as to citizenship and residence, recitals as to the provisions of the statute and statements as to the business of the corporation contained in the first 10 paragraphs of the bill advanced to sustain jurisdiction, the bill alleged 21 constitutional objections specified in that number of paragraphs or subdivisions. As all the grounds assert a violation of the Constitution it follows that in a wide sense they all charge a repugnancy of the statute to the sixteenth amendment under the more imediate sanction of which the statute was adopted.

"The various propositions are so intermingled as to cause it to be difficult to classify them. We are of opinion, however, that the confusion is not inherent, but rather arises from the conclusion that the sixteenth amendment provides for a hitherto unknown power of taxation; that is, a power to levy an income tax which although direct should not be subject to the regulation of apportionment applicable to all other direct taxes. And the far-reaching effect of this erroneous assumption will be made clear by generalizing the many contentions advanced in argument to support it, as follows: (a) The amendment authorizes only a particular character of direct tax without apportionment, and therefore if a tax is levied under its assumed authority which does not partake of the characteristics exacted by the amendment it is outside of the amendment and is void as a direct tax in the general constituional sense because not apportioned. (b) As the amendment authorizes a tax only upon incomes 'from whatever source derived,' the exclusion from taxation of some income of designated persons and classes is not authorized and hence the constitutionality of the law must be tested by the general provisions of the Constitution as to taxation, and thus again the tax is void for want of apportionment. (c) As the right to tax "incomes from whatever source derived" for which the amendment provides must be considered as exacting intrinsic uniformity, therefore no tax comes under the authority of the amendment not conforming to such standard, and hence all the provisions of the assailed statute must once more be tested solely under the general and preexisting provisions of the Constitution, causing the statute again to be void in the absence of apportionment. (d) As the power conferred by the amendment is new and prospective the attempt in the statute to make its provisions retroactively apply is void, because so far as the retroactive period is concerned it is governed by the preexisting constitutional requirement as to apportionment.

"But it clearly results that the proposition and the contentions under it, if acceded to, would cause one provision of the Constitution to destroy another; that is, they would result in bringing the provisions of the amendment exempting a direct tax from apportionment into irreconcilable conflict with the general requirement that all direct taxes be apportioned. Moreover, the tax authorized by the amendment, being direct, would not come under the rule of uniformity applicable under the Constitution to other than direct taxes, and thus it would come to pass that the result of the amendment would be to authorize a particular direct tax not subject either to apportionment or to the rule of geographical uniformity, thus giving power to impose a different tax in one State or States than was levied in another State or States. This result instead of simplifying the situation and making clear the limitations on the taxing power, which obviously the amendment must have been intended to accomplish, would create radical and destructive changes in our constitutional system and multiply confusion.

"But let us by a demonstration of the error of the fundamental proposition as to the significance of the amendment dispel the confusion necessarily arising from the arguments deduced from it. Before coming, however, to the text of the amendment, to the end that its significance may be determined in the light of the previous legislative and judicial history of the subject with which the amendment is concerned and with a knowledge of the conditions which presumptively led up to its adoption and hence of the purpose it was intended to accomplish, we make a brief statement on those subjects.

"That the authority conferred upon Congress by section 8 of Article I, 'to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises,' is exhaustive and embraces every conceivable power of taxation has never been questioned, or, if it has, has been so often authoritatively declared as to render it necessary only to state the doctrine. And it has also never been questioned from the foundation, without stopping presently to determine under which of the separate headings the power was properly to be classed, that there was authority given, as the part was included in the whole, to lay and collect income taxes. Again it has never, moreover, been questioned that the conceded complete and all-embracing taxing power was subject, so far as they were respectively applicable, to limitations resulting from the requirements of Article I, section 8, clause 1, that 'all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States,' and to the limitations of Article I, section 2, clause 3, that 'direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States,' and of Article I, section 9, clause 4, that 'no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken.' In fact, the two great subdivisions embracing the complete and perfect delegation of the power to tax and the two correlated limitations as to such power were thus aptly stated by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., supra, at page 557: 'In the matter of taxation, the Constitution recognizes the two great classes of direct and indirect taxes, and lays down two rules by which their imposition must be governed, namely, the rule of apportionment as to direct taxes and the rule of uniformity as to duties, imposts, and excises.' It is to be observed, however, as long ago pointed out in Veazie Bank v. Fenno (8 Wall., 533, 541), that the requirement of apportionment as to one of the great classes and of uniformity as to the other class were not so much a limitation upon the complete and all-embracing authority to tax, but in their essence were simply regulations concerning the mode in which the plenary power was to be exerted. In the whole history of the Government down to the time of the adoption of the sixteenth amendment, leaving aside some conjectures expressed of the possibility of a tax lying intermediate between the two great classes and embraced by neither, no question has been anywhere made as to the correctness of these propositions. At the very beginning, however, there arose differences of opinion concerning the criteria to be applied in determining in which of the two great subdivisions a tax would fall. Without pausing to state at length the basis of these differences and the consequences which arose from them, as the whole subject was elaborately reviewed in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S., 429; 158 U. S., 601), we make a condensed statement which is, in substance, taken from what was said in that case. Early the differences were manifested in pressing on the one hand and opposing on the other the passage of an act levying a tax without apportionment on carriages 'for the conveyance of persons,' and when such a tax was enacted the question of its repugnancy to the Constitution soon came to this court for determination. (Hylton v. United States, 3 Dall., 171.) It was held that the tax came within the class of excises, duties, and imposts, and therefore did not require apportionment, and while this conclusion was agreed to by all the members of the court who took part in the decision of the case, there was not an exact coincidence in the reasoning by which the conclusion was sustained. Without stating the minor differences, it may be said with substantial accuracy that the divergent reasoning was this: On the one hand, that the tax was not in the class of direct taxes requiring apportionment, because it was not levied directly on property because of its ownership, but rather on its use, and was, therefore, an excise, duty, or impost; and, on the other, that in any event the class of direct taxes included only taxes directly levied on real estate because of its ownership.

"Putting out of view the difference of reasoning which led to the concurrent conclusion in the Hylton case, it is undoubted that it came to pass in legislative practice that the line of demarcation between the two great classes of direct taxes on the one hand and excises, duties, and imposts on the other, which was exemplified by the ruling in that case, was accepted and acted upon. In the first place, this is shown by the fact that wherever—and there were a number of cases of that kind—a tax was levied directly on real estate or slaves because of ownership it was treated as coming within the direct class, and apportionment was provided for, while no instance of apportionment as to any other kind of tax is afforded. Again, the situation is aptly illustrated by the various acts taxing incomes derived from property of every kind and nature which were enacted beginning in 1861 and lasting during what may be termed the Civil War period. It is not disputable that these latter taxing laws were classed under the head of excises, duties, and imposts, because it was assumed that they were of that character, inasmuch as, although putting a tax burden on income of every kind, including that derived from property, real or personal, they were not taxes directly on property because of its ownership. And this practical construction came in theory to be the accepted one, since it was adopted without dissent by the most eminent of the text-writers. (1 Kent. Com., 254, 256; 1 Story Const., sec. 955; Cooley Const. Lim. (5th ed.), *480; Miller on the Constitution, 237; Pomeroy's Const. Law, sec. 281; Hare Const. Law, vol. 1, 249, 250; Burroughs on Taxation, 502; Ordronaux, Const. Leg., 225.)

"Upon the lapsing of a considerable period after the repeal of the income-tax laws referred to, in 1894 an act was passed laying a tax on incomes from all classes of property and other sources of revenue which was not apportioned, and which, therefore, was, of course, assumed to come within the classification of excises, duties, and imposts which were subject to the rule of uniformity but not to the rule of apportionment. The constitutional validity of this law was challenged on the ground that it did not fall within the class of excises, duties, and imposts, but was direct in the constitutional sense, and was therefore void for want of apportionment; and that question came to this court and was passed upon in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S., 429; 158 U. S., 601). The court, fully recognizing in the passage which we have previously quoted the all-embracing character of the two great classifications, including, on the one hand, direct taxes subject to apportionment, and, on the other, excises, duties, and imposts subject to uniformity, held the law to be unconstitutional in substance for these reasons: Concluding that the classification of direct was adopted for the purpose of rendering it impossible to burden by taxation accumulations of property, real or personal, except subject to the regulation of apportionment, it was held that the duty existed to fix what was a direct tax in the constitutional sense so as to accomplish this purpose contemplated by the Constitution. (157 U. S., 581.) Coming to consider the validity of the tax from this point of view, while not questioning at all that in common understanding it was direct merely on income and only indirect on property, it was held that considering the substance of things it was direct on property in a constitutional sense, since to burden an income by a tax was, from the point of substance, to burden the property from which the income was derived and thus accomplish the very thing which the provision as to apportionment of direct taxes was adopted to prevent. As this conclusion but enforced a regulation as to the mode of exercising power under particular circumstances, it did not in any way dispute the all-embracing taxing authority possessed by Congress, including necessarily therein the power to impose income taxes if only they conformed to the constitutional regulations which were applicable to them. Moreover, in addition, the conclusion reached in the Pollock case did not in any degree involve holding that income taxes generically and necessarily came within the class of direct taxes on property, but, on the contrary, recognized the fact that taxation on income was in its nature an excise entitled to be enforced as such unless and until it was concluded that to enforce it would amount to accomplishing the result which the requirement as to apportionment of direct taxation was adopted to prevent, in which case the duty would arise to disregard form and consider substance alone, and hence subject the tax to the regulation as to apportionment, which otherwise as an excise would not apply to it. Nothing could serve to make this clearer than to recall that in the Pollock case, in so far as the law taxed incomes from other classes of property than real estate and invested personal property—that is, income from 'professions, trades, employments, or vocations' (158 U. S., 637)—its validity was recognized; indeed, it was expressly declared that no dispute was made upon that subject, and attention was called to the fact that taxes on such income had been sustained as excise taxes in the past. (Ib., p. 635.) The whole law was, however, declared unconstitutional on the ground that to permit it to thus operate would relieve real estate and invested personal property from taxation and 'would leave the burden of the tax to be borne by professions, trades, employments, or vocations, and in that way what was intended as a tax on capital would remain, in substance, a tax on occupations and labor' (ib., p. 637), a result which it was held could not have been contemplated by Congress.

"This is the text of the amendment:

> "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.

"It is clear on the face of this text that it does not purport to confer power to levy income taxes in a generic sense—an authority already possessed and never questioned—or to limit and distinguish between one kind of income taxes and another, but that the whole purpose of the amendment was to relieve all income taxes when imposed from apportionment from a consideration of the source whence the income was derived. Indeed in the light of the history which we have given and of the decision in the Pollock case and the ground upon which the ruling in that case was based, there is no escape from the conclusion that the amendment was drawn for the purpose of doing away for the future with the principle upon which the Pollock case was decided; that is, of determining whether a tax on income was direct not by a consideration of the burden placed on the taxed income upon which it directly operated, but by taking into view the burden which resulted on the property from which the income was derived, since in express terms the amendment provides that income taxes, from whatever source the income may be derived, shall not be subject to the regulation of apportionment. From this, in substance, it indisputably arises, first, that all the contentions which we have previously noticed concerning the assumed limitations to be implied from the language of the amendment as to the nature and character of the income taxes which it authorizes find no support in the text and are in irreconcilable conflict with the very purpose which the amendment was adopted to accomplish. Second, that the contention that the amendment treats a tax on income as a direct tax although it is relieved from apportionment and is necessarily therefore not subject to the rule of uniformity, as such rule only applies to taxes which are not direct, thus destroying the two great classifications which have been recognized and enforced from the beginning, is also wholly without foundation since the command of the amendment, that all income taxes shall not be subject to apportionment by a consideration of the sources from which the taxed income may be derived, forbids the application to such taxes of the rule applied in the Pollock case by which alone such taxes were removed from the great class of excises, duties, and imposts subject to the rule of uniformity and were placed under the other or direct class. This must be unless it can be said that although the Constitution, as a result of the amendment, in express terms excludes the criterion of source of income, that criterion yet remains for the purpose of destroying the classifications of the Constitution by taking an excise out of the class to which it belongs and transferring it to a class in which it can not be placed consistently with the requirements of the Constitution. Indeed, from another point of view, the amendment demonstrates that no such purpose was intended and, on the contrary, shows that it was drawn with the object of maintaining the limitations of the Constitution and harmonizing their operation. We say this because it is to be observed that although from the date of the Hylton case, because of statements made in the opinions in that case, it had come to be accepted that direct taxes in the constitutional sense were confined to taxes levied directly on real estate because of its ownership, the amendment contains nothing repudiating or challenging the ruling in the Pollock case that the word direct had a broader significance since it embraced also taxes levied directly on personal property because of its ownership, and therefore the amendment at least impliedly makes such wider significance a part of the Constitution—a condition which clearly demonstrates that the purpose was not to change the existing interpretation except to the extent necessary to accomplish the result intended; that is, the prevention of the resort to the sources from which a taxed income was derived in order to cause a direct tax on the income to be a direct tax on the source itself, and thereby to take an income tax out of the class of excises, duties, and imposts and place it in the class of direct taxes.

"We come, then, to ascertain the merits of the many contentions made in the light of the Constitution as it now stands; that is to say, including within its terms the provisions of the sixteenth amendment as correctly interpreted. We first dispose of two propositions assailing the validity of the statute on the one hand because of its repugnancy to the Constitution in other respects, and especially because its enactment was not authorized by the sixteenth amendment.

"The statute was enacted October 3, 1913, and provided for a general yearly income tax from December to December of each year. Exceptionally, however, it fixed a first period embracing only the time from March 1 to December 31, 1913, and this limited retroactivity is assailed as repugnant to the due-process clause of the fifth amendment and as inconsistent with the sixteenth amendment itself. But the date of the retroactivity did not extend beyond the time when the amendment was operative, and there can be no dispute that there was power by virtue of the amendment during that period to levy the tax, without apportionment, and so far as the limitations of the Constitution in other respects are concerned, the contention is not open, since in Stockdale v. Insurance Companies (20 Wall., 323, 331), in sustaining a provision in a prior income-tax law which was assailed because of its retroactive character, it was said:

> "The right of Congress to have imposed this tax by a new statute, although the measure of it was governed by the income of the past year, can not be doubted; much less can it be doubted that it could impose such a tax on the income of the current year, though part of that year had elapsed when the statute was passed. The joint resolution of July 4, 1864, imposed a tax of 5 per cent upon all income of the previous year, although one tax on it had already been paid, and no one doubted the validity of the tax or attempted to resist it.

"The statute provides that the tax should not apply to enumerated organizations or corporations, such as labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, mutual savings banks, etc., and the argument is that as the amendment authorized a tax on incomes 'from whatever source derived,' by implication it excluded the power to make these exemptions. But this is only a form of expressing the erroneous contention as to the meaning of the amendment, which we have already disposed of. And so far as this alleged illegality is based on other provisions of the Constitution, the contention is also not open, since it was expressly considered and disposed of in Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. (220 U. S., 108, 173).

"Without expressly stating all the other contentions, we summarize them to a degree adequate to enable us to typify and dispose of all of them.

"1. The statute levies one tax called a normal tax on all incomes of individuals up to $20,000 and from that amount up by gradations, a progressively increasing tax called an additional tax, is imposed. No tax, however, is levied upon incomes of unmarried individuals amounting to $3,000 or less nor upon incomes of married persons amounting to $4,000 or less. The progressive tax and the exempted amounts, it is said, are based on wealth alone, and the tax is therefore repugnant to the due-process clause of the fifth amendment.

"2. The act provides for collecting the tax at the source—that is, makes it the duty of corporations, etc., to retain and pay the sum of the tax on interest due on bonds and mortgages, unless the owner to whom the interest is payable gives a notice that he claims an exemption. This duty cast upon corporations, because of the cost to which they are subjected, is asserted to be repugnant to due process of law as a taking of their property without compensation, and we recapitulate various contentions as to discrimination against corporations and against individuals predicated on provisions of the act dealing with the subject:

"(a) Corporations indebted upon coupon and registered bonds are discriminated against, since corporations not so indebted are relieved of any labor or expense involved in deducting and paying the taxes of individuals on the income derived from bonds.

"(b) Of the class of corporations indebted as above stated, the law further discriminates against those which have assumed the payment of taxes on their bonds, since although some or all of their bondholders may be exempt from taxation, the corporations have no means of ascertaining such fact, and it would therefore result that taxes would often be paid by such corporations when no taxes were owing by the individuals to the Government.

"(c) The law discriminates against owners of corporate bonds in favor of individuals none of whose income is derived from such property, since bondholders are, during the interval between the deducting and the paying of the tax on their bonds, deprived of the use of the money so withheld.

"(d) Again corporate bondholders are discriminated against because the law does not release them from payment of taxes on their bonds even after the taxes have been deducted by the corporation, and therefore if after deduction the corporation should fail, the bondholders would be compelled to pay the tax a second time.

"(e) Owners of bonds the taxes on which have been assumed by the corporation are discriminated against, because the payment of the taxes by the corporation does not relieve the bondholders of their duty to include the income from such bonds in making a return of all income, the result being a double payment of the taxes, labor and expense in applying for a refund, and a deprivation of the use of the sum of the taxes during the interval which elapses before they are refunded.

"3. The provision limiting the amount of interest paid which may be deducted from gross income of corporations for the purpose of fixing the taxable income to interest on indebtedness not exceeding one-half the sum of bonded indebtedness and paid-up capital stock, is also charged to be wanting in due process because discriminating between different classes of corporations and individuals.

"4. It is urged that want of due process results from the provision allowing individuals to deduct from their gross income dividends paid them by corporations whose incomes are taxed and not gving such right of deduction to corporations.

"5. Want of due process is also asserted to result from the fact that the act allows a deduction of $3,000 or $4,000 to those who pay the normal tax; that is, whose incomes are $20,000 or less, and does not allow the deduction to those whose incomes are greater than $20,000; that is, such persons are not allowed for the purpose of the additional or progressive tax a second right to deduct the $3,000 or $4,000 which they have already enjoyed. And a further violation of due process is based on the fact that for the purpose of the additional tax no second right to deduct dividends received from corporations is permitted.

"6. In various forms of statement want of due process, it is, moreover, insisted, arises from the provisions of the act allowing a deduction for the purpose of ascertaining the taxable income of stated amounts on the ground that the provisions discriminate between married and single people and discriminate between husbands and wives who are living together and those who are not.

"7. Discrimination and want of due process results, it is said, from the fact that the owners of houses in which they live are not compelled to estmate the rental value in making up their incomes, while those who are living in rented houses and pay rent are not allowed, in making up their taxable income, to deduct rent which they have paid, and that want of due process also results from the fact that although family expenses are not as a rule permitted to be deducted from gross to arrive at taxable income, farmers are permitted to omit from their income return certain products of the farm which are susceptible of use by them for sustaining their families during the year.

"So far as these numerous and minute, not to say in many respects hypercritical, contentions are based upon an assumed violation of the uniformity clause, their want of legal merit is at once apparent, since it is settled that that clause exacts only a geographical uniformity, and there is not a semblance of ground in any of the propositions for assuming that a violation of such uniformity is complained of. (Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S., 41; Patton v. Brady, 184 U. S., 608, 622; Flint v. Stone Tracy Co., 220 U. S., 107, 158; Billings v. United States, 232 U. S., 608, 622.)

"So far as the due-process clause of the fifth amendment is relied upon, it suffices to say that there is no basis for such reliance, since it is equally well settled that such clause is not a limitation upon the taxing power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution; in other words, that the Constitution does not conflict with itself by conferring upon the one hand a taxing power and taking the same power away on the other by the limitations of the due-process clause. (Treat v. White, 181 U. S., 264; Patton v. Brady, 184 U. S., 608; McCray v. United States, 195 U. S., 27, 61; Flint v. Stone Tracy Co., supra; Billings v. United States, 232 U. S., 261, 282.) And no change in the situation here would arise even if it be conceded, as we think it must be, that this doctrine would have no application in a case where although there was a seeming exercise of the taxing power, the act complained of was so arbitrary as to constrain to the conclusion that it was not the exertion of taxation but a confiscation of property; that is, a taking of the same in violation of the fifth amendment, or, what is equivalent thereto, was so wanting in basis for classification as to produce such a gross and patent inequality as to inevitably lead to the same conclusion. We say this because none of the propositions relied upon in the remotest degree present such questions.

"It is true that it is elaborately insisted that although there be no express constitutional provision prohibiting it, the progressive feature of the tax causes it to transcend the conception of all taxation and to be a mere arbitrary abuse of power which must be treated as wanting in due process. But the proposition disregards the fact that in the very early history of the Government a progressive tax was imposed by Congress and that such authority was exerted in some if not all of the various income taxes enacted prior to 1894 to which we have previously adverted. And over and above all this the contention but disregards the further fact that its absolute want of foundation in reason was plainly pointed out in Knowlton v. Moore, supra, and the right to urge it was necessarily foreclosed by the ruling in that case made. In this situation it is, of course, superfluous to say that arguments as to the expediency of levying such taxes or of the economic mistake or wrong involved in their imposition are beyond judicial cognizance. Besides this demonstration of the want of merit in the contention based upon the progressive feature of the tax, the error in the others is equally well established either by prior decisions or by the adequate bases for classification which are apparent on the face of the assailed provisions; that is, the distinction between individuals and corporations, the difference between various kinds of corporations, etc. Knowlton v. Moore, supra; Flint v. Stone Tracy Co., supra; Billings v. United States, supra; National Bank v. Commonwealth (9 Wall., 353); National Safe Deposit Co. v. Illinois (232 U. S., 58, 70). In fact, comprehensively surveying all the contentions relied upon, aside from the erroneous construction of the amendment which we have previously disposed of, we can not escape the conclusion that they all rest upon the mistaken theory that although there be differences between the subjects taxed, to differently tax them transcends the limit of taxation and amounts to a want of due process, and that where a tax levied is believed by one who resists its enforcement to be wanting in wisdom and to operate injustice, from that fact in the nature of things there arises a want of due process of law and a resulting authority in the judiciary to exceed its powers and correct what is assumed to be mistaken or unwise exertions by the legislative authority of its lawful powers, even although there be no semblance of warrants in the Constitution for so doing.

"We have not referred to a contention that because certain administrative powers to enforce the act were conferred by the statute upon the Secretary of the Treasury, therefore it was void as unwarrantedly delegating legislative authority, because we think to state the proposition is to answer it. SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 26, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we know that Thou hast so constituted human life as that good may be brought out of every ill. Where sin has abounded grace hath much more abounded. Amid the conflict, the chaos, and the strife of the world which afflict our ears every day, telling the story of suffering and oppression, we pray that at least we may by our generous response and our hearty brotherhood gain the friendship of those who are distressed and gain for ourselves the sweet satisfaction of a blessed service.

We pray Thy blessing upon the generous offerings of this people poured upon the altar of humanity, that they may have the approval and the blessing of the Divine One upon them all, and through our service may we learn where honor is, the honor of a great nation like ours. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EDITORIAL ON MEXICAN SITUATION.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I have here an editorial from the Evening Express, of Santa Barbara, Cal., on the Mexican situation. It is a very temperate and dispassionate statement of the conditions, and as it is both interesting and instructive I should like to have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear the request of the Senator from California. What is the paper?

Mr. WORKS. I request to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Santa Barbara Express on the Mexican situation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I gave notice some time ago that I thought the time had arrived when editorials from newspapers on matters of this kind should be kept out of the RECORD. I do not know whether this is the time I should insist upon that course, but I want to say to the Senator that I am having figured up the amount of pages in the RECORD taken up by newspaper and magazine articles to show the percentage of the pages of the RECORD of such items. I will know in a day or two what that percentage is up to date; but I am quite certain the RECORD contains at least half of matter that has never been read or uttered in either House of Congress. I think the practice is being abused greatly, and if the Senator does not really think that the printing of this editorial in the RECORD is necessary, I should like very much to have him withdraw the request.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I have received a great many articles from newspapers that ought not to go into the RECORD at all. It was because of the nature of this particular editorial, which is very temperate in character and which I think would be instructive, that I have asked it may be printed in the RECORD. It is not one calculated to arouse the passion of the country. I think it is quite unwise to put in matters of that kind.

I would be glad if the Senator from Utah would look at it and see if he will not change his opinion as to printing it at the present time. If the Senator, or any other Senator, has serious objection after reading the editorial, of course I shall not ask to have it printed.

Mr. SMOOT. With that understanding, I shall not object. I want to see what it is.

Mr. STONE. Does it go in?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is what the Chair wants to know, whether it goes in the RECORD or is left to the Senator from Utah to determine.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am entirely in sympathy with what the Senator from Utah has stated and with his declared purpose to object. I do not think we ought to have a mass of newspaper editorials and matters of that kind put into the RECORD. No one ever reads them, or very few. It is not very informing and it is expensive. It simply gives to such a paper the right of the franking privilege. If the Senator from Utah does not object, I shall myself, in pursuance of the notice I gave some time ago.

Mr. SMOOT. I object at this time to printing the article in the RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. WORKS. I reserve the right to use it at some other time, and I withdraw the request for the present.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was about to remark, if the Senator will permit me, that the objection will hold until the Senator who offered it or some other Senator will read it to the Senate, and then it will go into the RECORD. That is about all an objection amounts to.

ESTIMATES OF DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Attorney General submitting an urgent estimate of deficiency in the appropriation for printing and binding, Court of Claims, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, $5,000 (S. Doc. No. 258), which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture submitting an urgent estimate of appropriation for destruction of predatory animals for suppression of rabies, $75,000 (S. Doc. No. 257), which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture submitting an urgent estimate of appropriation for cooperative investigations for eradication of white-pine blister rust, $20,000 (S. Doc. No. 259), which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 7617) to provide that in order to promote agriculture, afford better facilities for rural transportation and marketing farm products, and encourage the development of a general system of improved highways, the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, shall, in certain cases, aid the States in the construction, improvement, and maintenance of roads which may be used in the transportation of interstate commerce, military supplies, or postal matter, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. I present a petition signed by a number of citizens of the town of Nogales, Ariz. I ask that the body of the petition, together with the first signature, be printed in the RECORD, and that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOGALES, ARIZ., January 17, 1916.

To Senator HENRY F. ASHURST, Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned, members of the Chamber of Commerce and citizens of the town of Nogales, Ariz., desire to express our sincere sorrow for the relatives and friends of the victims of the dastardly outrage committed by Mexican outlaws and bandits, whoever they may be, at Santa Isabel, Chihuahua, on Monday, January 10, 1916, and our heartfelt sympathy for them in their hour of great grief and sorrow.

Realizing as we do the deep gravity of the situation which now on all sides confronts the American people and the grave responsibility which is placed upon President Wilson and the administration at Washington, we hereby desire to express our full confidence in the President and those in authority with him, and as American citizens to assure him and them of our loyal support and assistance in arriving at a correct and just solution of the difficult problems with which they find themselves confronted.

And we condemn, with all the vehemence of which we are capable, and repudiate the rash, unnecessary, ill-timed, uncalled-for and insulting resolutions prepared and adopted by a committee purporting to represent the Nogales Chamber of Commerce, as published in a Nogales newspaper; and we most emphatically deny that these resolutions express the sentiment of the people of Nogales or that the persons responsible for them represent the populace of this border community.

We believe that at such a time as the present it is the duty of every loyal American to refrain from giving rise to any act, or expression to any thought, which may in any manner or to any degree cause embarrassment to those in authority; and when, as now, the administration and the Congress of the United States are giving the benefit of their united wisdom, coupled with their years of experience, to the solution of the problems on hand, and when every word spoken by them is guarded in the interest of true Americanism, we regret the indiscretion which prompted the resolution of such committee.

ALLEN T. BIRD,
(And 37 other names).

Mr. PHELAN. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of California, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. McCUMBER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 81), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard be authorized to employ an additional clerk, at a salary of $100 per month, for the balance of the present fiscal year, the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

EMPLOYMENT OF ASSISTANT CLERK.

Mr. CHILTON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 82), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Census be authorized to employ an assistant clerk at the rate of $120 per month, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate for a period not exceeding two months.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the following communication, which will be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: This is to inform you that I desire to be relieved from further service on the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments.

Very truly, yours, HARRY LANE.

Mr. KERN. I send to the desk my resignation as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, which I ask may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

MR. PRESIDENT: I hereby resign my membership on the Committee on the District of Columbia.

JOHN W. KERN.

Mr. KERN. I move the adoption of the following order.

The order was read and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN, junior Senator from the State of California, be appointed as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Senator KERN.

ADDRESS BY J. F. CALLBREATH.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I present an address by J. F. Callbreath, secretary of the American Mining Congress, delivered January 4, 1916, before the second Pan American Scientific Congress in Washington, District of Columbia. I ask unanimous consent that it be made a public document.

Mr. SMOOT. I am of the opinion that that address has already been printed as a public document in connection with the other addresses which were delivered before that congress.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If that is true, I do not care to press the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It had better go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will withhold it.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it go to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

NEW YORK STATE BAR ASSOCIATION.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document the second report of the committee on the duty of courts to refuse to execute statutes in contravention of the fundamental law, adopted by the New York State Bar Association.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that paper may go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. O'GORMAN. We printed the first report and this is the second one.

Mr. SMOOT. I will look it over and see about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The matter will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

ADDRESS BY HON. A. C. GORDON (S. DOC. NO. 256).

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, on the 4th day of March, 1911, Congress made an appropriation for the erection of a suitable monument over the grave of ex-President John Tyler. The monument, in accordance with the act of Congress, was erected by the War Department, and it was dedicated on the 12th day of October, 1915. In the meanstime a committee of the two Houses had been appointed to represent Congress at the dedication.

On the occasion of the dedication a very able and interesting address was delivered by Mr. A. C. Gordon, a distinguished author and lawyer in my State. The address is such a very able and philosophic discussion of the period of President Tyler that I ask it may be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if the address was delivered in connection with the dedication of the monument?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It was. The monument was erected under an act of Congress, and a delegation from Congress was present to represent Congress at the dedication. I ask that the address may be printed as a document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from President Nicholas Murray Butler, of Columbia University, in favor of establishing a permanent tariff commission; also a letter from Prof. Hadley, of Yale University, on the same subject; also a letter from Hon. E. A. Filene, of Boston, favoring the establishment of such a commission.

I ask to have read to the Senate a letter from Hon. Howard H. Gross, of Chicago, president of the Tariff Commission League.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know how long these letters are.

Mr. GORE. I ask for the reading of only one of the letters. It is not very lengthy. The others I ask to have printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read the letter referred to.

The Secretary read as follows:

JANUARY 25, 1916.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am very glad to reply to your inquiry and say why, in my opinion, a nonpolitical tariff commission should at once be created and permanently maintained. As president of the Tariff Commission League, I have for more than a year, aided by a number of able field assistants, made a careful study of the subject and a thorough canvass of more than 30 States to feel out public sentiment. The following summary is conservative as to conditions and how it is best to meet them.

We are facing a future of great uncertainty and perhaps of peril. Our revenues must be largely increased and the tariff should be readjusted with that in view. Since the Underwood-Simmons Tariff Act was passed conditions have greatly changed and are still changing. No one can approximate what the situation will be in six months or a year. We are sure that, with over fifty billions of wealth already destroyed and half a continent laid waste by war, that when peace comes and ten to twenty millions of men, now in trenches, go back to the industries we will, in common with all other countries, face an unparallel situation that will call for a world-wide readjustment.

If it were conceded that the present tariff laws were the best ever enacted, it does not now and can not under the changed conditions meet the requirements. The data upon which it was based has in a large measure become obsolete. There seems but one thing to do: Make at once such changes as will increase the revenue to the amount required and at the same time create a nonpolitical tariff commission, equally balanced between the majority and minority parties, and give its members a long tenure of office, with broad powers and an ample appropriation, so that it may take up and fully and fairly investigate the whole subject of tariff, both revenue and protective, gather all the facts that can be had, and then analyze, arrange, classify, and index them with such explanations as will make them readily understood and available.

This commission should be responsive to Congress and it should be broadly representative of all the people and all the great industries, including agriculture and labor along with manufactures, commerce, and general business. Given a commission of high personnel and its reports and conclusions would be accepted by the people. If, however, the same work were done by a bureau responsive to a Cabinet officer, the result would be regarded as ex parte and open to question.

The demand for a nonpolitical tariff commission is widespread and insistent and comes from all classes of people from various parts of the country. The American Federation of Labor at its late convention in San Francisco went on record strongly for it, and instructed its legislative committee to work for the passage of an act to create such a commission upon which both agriculture and labor should be represented. The National Grange and other agricultural organizations are actively supporting it. Practically the entire agricultural and labor press are urging the plan. The Chamber of Commerce of the United States by a referendum vote of 715 to 9, are in favor of such a commission. The records of our league are comprehensive and have been carefully kept. They show that more than 90 per cent of the organizations, associations, and publications, representing all political parties and all forms of activity, strongly approve the plan. Where six months ago occasional paragraphs appeared upon the subject, now columns are being printed. I never have known a movement having a more vigorous or spontaneous growth. The people with practically one voice declare that the tariff must be put upon an economic rather than a political basis. Is it a vain hope that when all the facts are fully, fairly, clearly, and impartially brought out and put before the people in understandable form that they will speedily declare for a tariff policy and adhere to it as other countries have done? The people think straight. Give them all the facts and turn on the light. The people should keep clearly before them that the tariff commission is not to decide upon tariff policies. That is the people's job. The commission can not make rates. Congress must do that. In tariff enactments, however, an able and efficient tariff commission can render invaluable service to the congressional committees, prevent them from being imposed upon by an unscrupulous lobby, and, with all the facts at hand, it can aid in a wise adjustment of the tariff rates as may become necessary. For generations we have tried making tariffs upon insufficient data plus guesswork and inspiration, and we have failed to satisfy the people. Within 23 years we have had five tariff revisions, and every time business has been upset, losses have taken the place of profits with hundreds of thousands of idle men. If the aggregate loss could be totaled the sum would be appalling. One of the first steps in a sane program of preparedness is to increase the revenue and get ready to adjust ourselves to coming conditions. We must prepare for peace as well as for war. Anyone who would tinker the tariff for political ends under existing conditions should be regarded a public enemy.

Very truly, yours,

HOWARD H. GROSS,
President of the Tariff Commission League.

To the Hon. THOMAS PRYOR GORE,
United States Senate.

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., January 12, 1916.

Mr. H. H. GROSS,
Congress Hall Hotel, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The American Federation of Labor at its recent convention, held in San Francisco, November 8 to 22, 1915, adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas periods of industrial depression are of frequent occurrence and cause loss of employment to thousands of wage earners throughout the country; and

"Whereas these industrial depressions are often prolonged and made more acute by the political methods that have been followed in dealing with the question of tariff schedules; and

"Whereas an agitation is now in progress throughout the country in favor of taking the tariff out of politics, through the creation by Congress of a permanent nonpartisan tariff commission: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the American Federation of Labor indorses the idea of a nonpartisan tariff commission, and directs the executive council to instruct the incoming legislative committee to work for the passage of a bill creating a tariff commisison on which all interest, including agriculture and labor, shall be directly represented."

This action of the convention expresses the attitude of the organized labor movement of America toward the creation of a permanent nonpartisan tariff commission, a movement in which you are greatly interested. As I thought this action of the convention might be of considerable use to you, I am officially notifying you.

Very truly, yours,

SAM GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

The additional letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY,
New York, November 15, 1915.

Hon. T. P. GORE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In reply to your kind inquiry for suggestions in regard to Senate bill 7190, being a bill to create an international trade and tariff board, introduced by you at the third session of the Sixty-third Congress on January 8, 1915, and referred to the Committee on Finance, I beg to say—

1. That I am very much in favor of the creation of a tariff board or commission, with as large powers as may be found permissible under the Constitution, not only to inquire into matters of cost, production, labor conditions, and the like, but actually to formulate proposals and recommendations for the consideration of the Congress. The commission should have this power on its own initiative without being specifically asked to exercise it by the Congress. If the men appointed to the tariff board or commission were really disinterested and intelligent men, public opinion would do the rest.

2. That, in my judgment, the tariff policy of the United States should, in addition to providing revenue, be used to organize and to develop the national industries and resources and to conserve them, as well as to round out groups of industries and to make the United States industrially independent, at least in certain of the major lines of manufactured goods. For example, the experiences growing out of the European war show clearly that we must build up in this country a whole series of chemical industries, including particularly the dyestuffs, as to which we have heretofore been almost entirely dependent on other countries, especially Germany.

3. That the composition of the tariff board or commission should be without any regard to politics whatever, and that there should be no provision in the bill for dividing the commission between two or more political parties or for representing political parties thereon. If the tariff commission starts as a political body, it will end as a worthless one.

4. That care should be taken not to duplicate or in any way to overlap the functions and jurisdiction of the existing Trade Commission. The law establishing that commission is very defective, but a good seed has been sown from which later on important fruit may be gathered.

Without more study I could not express any opinion as to whether or not there exists in the present Government administrative service any body which might be transformed into an international tariff or trade commission without involving us in the steadily increasing expense which always attaches to a new administrative unit. What we sorely need in Washington is administrative reorganization and simplification, in order that the people's business may be transacted as efficiently and as economically as is the business of the stockholders of a first-rate railway or manufacturing corporation.

It will interest me very much to follow the public consideration and discussion of this bill.

Faithfully yours,

NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER.

YALE UNIVERSITY,
New Haven, Conn, November 22, 1915.

Hon. T. P. GORE.

MY DEAR SIR: Your bill creating an international trade and tariff board appears to me to be a wise one and to be drawn on the right general lines. I do not feel that I am in sufficiently close touch with the administrative problems that such a board would have to take up to be able to say more than this or to offer detailed suggestions as to the possible improvement of the proposed measure.

Very sincerely,

ARTHUR T. HADLEY.

BOSTON, November 15, 1915.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have read the draft of the tariff board bill which you introduced in the last Congress with much interest, and I am writing to you because I want you to know that I am strongly in favor of your recommendation that the board shall consist of three Republicans and three Democrats. I feel that there will be a great advantage in such a make-up, and that its chance of being passed at the next session of Congress will be largely increased thereby. * * *

The name of the bill, I think, was stronger in the old form—"International Trade and Tariff Board"—than it will be if you introduce the word "efficiency." However, it seems to me that it might be further strengthened by substituting, as a suggestion, the word "taxation" in the place of the word "tariff." In this way you will cover the whole ground of taxation and not be limited to the tariff. This, it seems to me, would be a very wise substitution, because the task of dealing with the entire subject of taxation is one which will naturally develop from a scientific study of the tariff situation. When it comes to efficiency, however, it is another matter, and the word itself has been so misapplied, and the results of this misapplication have so antagonized many manufacturers and business men, that it seems to me it will arouse more opposition than will be wise for us to incur.

You have asked whether I consider that $7,500 would be an adequate compensation. Frankly, I do not. I think that the members of this commission should certainly be of at least as high grade as the members of the Federal Reserve Board, and I do not believe that such men can be obtained for less than $10,000 salaries. An appropriation of $250,000, I should say, would, therefore, be much nearer the figure than $100,000.

Now, as to section 7, I am of the opinion that this commission should sit continuously through at least eight months of the year; and it would seem to me wise that the Secretaries of Commerce, Agriculture, and Labor and representatives of commercial organizations should meet with the tariff board on stated occasions to consider special questions likely to affect, or be affected by, their several departments. The precedent for this has already been set, I should think, by the fact that the Secretary of Commerce meets often the representatives of business organizations in order to promote the same good feeling for which it seems to be the purpose of your section to provide. With the other provisions of this section and of the bill I find myself practically in agreement. I hope that, as your letter seems to suggest, your purpose is to push it, if possible, to passage at the next session. * * *

With kindest regards, believe me, sincerely yours,

EDWARD A. FILENE.

NOVEMBER 21, 1915.

I have held this letter to again think it over carefully. I find, after studying the matter once more, that this letter expresses my best judgment, except that I now find that I am doubtful whether the change suggested as to including "taxation" in the title is good advice.

E. A. F.

Hon. T. P. GORE,
Senator from Oklahoma, Washington, D. C.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 7617. An act to provide that in order to promote agriculture, afford better facilities for rural transportation and marketing farm products, and encourage the development of a general system of improved highways, the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, shall in certain cases aid the States in the construction, improvement, and maintenance of roads which may be used in the transportation of interstate commerce, military supplies, or postal matter was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

INTERFERENCE WITH FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Friday next, the 28th instant, at the conclusion of the routine morning business, I shall address the Senate on the subject of interference with our foreign relations.

ELECTION OF SENATORS.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, when the Senate had under consideration Senate bill No. 2860, providing a temporary method of conducting the nomination and election of Senators of the United States, in February, 1914, Senator Bacon, of Georgia, moved to amend by striking out the provisions of section 2 of the bill, regulating the nomination of candidates for Senator, the objection to these being that while Congress had the power, under Article I, section 4, of the Constitution, to make or alter the regulations provided by the States concerning the time and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, it had no power to regulate the nomination of candidates by political parties for these offices; and in this position he was supported by a number of Senators. I was one of the number in favor of the amendment, upon the grounds stated, and presented a number of adjudged cases which I then believed and now believe upheld the position that nominating devices of political parties were no part of an election and the control of them was not within the power and jurisdiction of the Congress. The adjudged cases upon which I relied were from the courts of last resort of a number of the States, but did not include any from the Federal courts. Since that time the question has been presented in the case of C. P. Elliott v. R. L. Thompson et al., lately pending in the United States district court for the western division of the western district of the State of Missouri, and determined in all things as contended by Senator Bacon and those agreeing with him. The opinion in the case was delivered by Hon. Wilbur F. Booth, one of the district judges of the United States and a jurist of great learning and ability.

The question involved in the amendment of Senator Bacon was considered one of great importance by many Senators, as they regarded the provision for controlling the nomination of Members of Congress an insidious and gross encroachment upon and violation of the rights of the sovereign States to control their local affairs, and is not yet settled in favor of the legislation. It may come up again in Congress, and I desire, in support of the views of those who supported the amendment, to have the opinion of Judge Booth printed in the RECORD, and ask unanimous consent that it be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The opinion referred to is as follows:

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE WESTERN DIVISION OF THE WESTERN DISTRICT OF MISSOURI, AT KANSAS CITY.

C. P. ELLIOTT, PLAINTIFF, v. R. L. THOMPSON, BENJAMIN RAPP, MAX C. ENGLEHARDT, PAT MURPHY, H. M. SMITH, J. C. BAIRD, R. H. FOSTER, H. C. HILL, WM. S. BEEBE, LEWIS SCHAFFER, WM. CONLIN, C. H. HERSEY, PETER KLINK, ET AL., DEFENDANTS.

This is an application by plaintiff for a dedimus potestatem to take depositions, as provided by section 866, Revised Statutes of the United States.

The application is opposed by defendants on the ground that the court has not jurisdiction of the action; on the further ground that the complaint does not state a cause of action; and on the further ground that the application should not be granted, because the granting of it would be contrary to the provisions of the constitution and statutes of the State of Missouri.

The action is brought by a citizen of the State of Missouri against defendants, who are also citizens of the State of Missouri, for damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of a conspiracy on the part of all of the defendants, and by reason, pursuant thereto, of the refusal by several of the defendants acting as judges and clerks of a certain primary election held in the city of Kansas City, State of Missouri, on the 4th day of August, 1914, to count the vote of the plaintiff as cast by him for WILLIAM P. BORLAND for Member of Congress.

Judisdiction by this court is claimed to exist on the ground that the action is one arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States; the plaintiff alleging, "that said defendants herein did procure and cause the plaintiff to be deprived of a right and privilege secured to him by the Constitution and laws of the United States of voting for a Member of Congress for the fifth congressional district."

The right of suffrage in general is not a right that is based upon the Constitution and laws of the United States, nor conferred by Congress upon anyone, but is conferred by the several States. (Minor v. Happersett, 21 Wall., 162; United States v. Reese, 92 U. S., 214; United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S., 544.)

The right to vote for Members of Congress, however, is based upon the Constitution and laws of the United States, and Congress may pass laws to protect this right. (Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U. S., 651; United States v. Moseley, 237 U. S.)

In the exercise of its power to protect this right Congress may adopt and has adopted many of the State laws relating to elections, and has provided punishment for a violation thereof, so far as such violations occur in elections where Representatives in Congress are being elected. That the officers of election wherein Representatives in Congress are elected, though appointed by the State, yet owe a duty to the United States, is also settled. (Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S., 371; Ex parte Clark, 100 U. S., 401; In re Coy, 127 U. S., 731; United States v. Aczel, 219 Fed., 917.)

Furthermore, in cases of contested elections for Representatives in Congress the Federal courts have power to issue subpœnas to obtain evidence, and may authorize the taking of evidence before commissioners. (In re Howell, 119 Fed., 465.)

Even where the State constitution and laws, as in Arkansas, provide for sealing up the ballots and forbid their being opened, except in cases of contested election, it has been held that such ballots can be ordered produced before Federal grand jury in an investigation for violation of the Federal election laws. (In re Massey, 45 Fed., 629.)

Furthermore, wrongful interference with the right to vote at an election for a Representative in Congress gives rise to a cause of action against the wrongdoer, and such cause of action is one arising under the constitution and laws of the United States. (Wiley v. Sinkler 179 U. S., 58; Swafford v. Templeton, 185 U. S., 491; Knight v. Shelton, 134 Fed., 423; Brickhouse v. Brooks, 165 Fed., 543.)

But, though the foregoing principles appear to be well established, it does not necessarily follow therefrom that the right to participate in a State primary election is a right arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, even though Representatives in Congress may be nominated at such primary election. And the crucial question in this case is whether, conceding the right to vote at said primary election existed in the plaintiff, and conceding that this right was violated by the defendants, this state of facts gives rise to a cause of action which can be said to be a case arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

A State primary election is not an election within the meaning of that term as used in the State constitutions and laws. This is the view of the courts in the great majority of the decisions, although there are decisions to the contrary. (State ex rel. Taylor, 220 M. O., 619; State v. Nichols, 50 Wash., 508; Lodgerwood v. Pitts, 122 Tenn., 570; State v. Johnson, 87 Minn., 152; State v. Erickson, 119 Minn., 152; Brown v. Smallwood (Minn.), 153 N. W., 953; Montgomery v. Chelf, 118 Ky., 766; Gray v. Seitz, 162 Ind., 1.)

In State v. Johnson, supra, the court said:

"The primary election law simply adopts a general method by which all parties and organizations shall, in the interests of public order upon a certain day, within certain regulations, meet and select their various nominees to go upon the ballot for the ensuing election."

And again, in State v. Erickson, supra, the court said:

"Our primary election, which is purely of statutory origin, is the selection, by qualified voters, of candidates for the respective offices to be filled, while an election, which has its origin in the Constitution, is the selection by such voters of officers to discharge the duties of the respective offices."

The rights of candidates and voters at primary elections are widely different from the rights of candidates and voters at an election proper. Legislation on various points may be passed with reference to rights and procedure under a primary election which would be unconstitutional if applied to an election proper. The right at a primary is not a right to vote to elect, but a right to vote to nominate. In other words, the primary is a mere nominating device. See authorities supra.

It is claimed, however, that Congress has recognized primary elections, and attention is called to the act of August, 1911, chapter 32, being United States Compiled Statutes 1913, section 195.

But in my opinion, it does not follow that because Congress has recognized State primary elections for certain purposes that it has adopted all the State laws touching the preliminary machinery of the State primaries, so that such laws become, as to the election of Representatives in Congress, laws of the United States.

The case of Anthony v. Burrow (129 Fed., 783), in some respects analogous to the instant case, is instructive. Judge Pollock, after reviewing the cases of ex parte Yarborough, Wiley v. Sinkler, and Swafford v. Templeton, supra, used the following language:

"From this it will be seen the claim made by solicitors for complainant, that the above and kindred cases hold the election machinery employed by the State in the selection of candidates for the office of Representative in Congress, becomes when so employed a part of the Federal law, and the construction of the same raises a Federal question, is claiming too much for such cases."

In the case at bar, not even the construction of the State law is involved, but it is contended that the violation of plaintiff's rights under said law constitutes a violation of the plaintiff's rights under the United States Constitution to vote for a Representative in Congress, because of a necessary connection between the right under the State law and the right under the United States Constitution. The claim is plausible, but, in my opinion, is not sound. As above stated, the great weight of authority is to the effect that a primary election is not an election within the meaning of the term as used generally in the State constitutions, and the same reasoning leads to the conclusion that a primary election is not an election within the meaning of that term as used in the Constitution of the United States in reference to the election of Representatives in Congress.

Nor is the right to participate in the primary to nominate candidates for Representatives in Congress a necessary part of the right to participate in the election. The primary election, as above shown, is simply a substitute for its predecessor, a convention or a caucus, and it is as stated above, a mere nominating device. It is true that in the interest of economy and practical efficiency in voting, many States have recognized this nominating device and prepare a so-called official ballot in accordance with the result of the primary; but no one is restricted in his vote at the final election to the names on the official ballot. At the election proper a voter may substitute a name of his own choice in place of a name on the ballot; this right can not be refused, and it is frequently exercised. The right therefore to participate in the nomination is not a necessary part of the right to elect, nor is is indispensably connected with it. In State v. Johnson, supra, the court said:

"The independence of the elector to cast his vote at the general election for those whom he believes will best represent his political ideas or best conserve public intercourse remains undisturbed."

While it is true that Congress has in the act of August, 1911, recognized for some purposes the primary election, it has also equally recognized nominating conventions. Would it be contended that if plaintiff had been voting for a precinct delegate to a county convention, which in turn should elect delegates to the congressional convention, which in turn should make nominations for Representatives in Congress, and the precinct judges had refused to count the plaintiff's vote as cast that a right of action in his favor would have arisen under the Constitution or laws of the United States? I think not. Yet his vote in the precinct would be a step taken toward the election of a Representative in Congress.

The weakness of the plaintiff's contention lies in the assumption that a nominating convention or a primary election is a necessary step in the election of a Representative in Congress. It is a very common step, but not a necessary step.

A primary election not being a necessary step in the election of a Representative in Congress, can not be held to be included by fair implication in the meaning of the term "election" as used in the Constitution of the United States touching the election of Representatives in Congress.

Whether it might be desirable for Congress to fully recognize and adopt the States' primary elections and the laws relating thereto so far as they relate to the nominations of Representatives in Congress and to provide for the protection and enforcement of the rights of voters at such primary elections is a question which the courts are not called upon to decide. It is sufficient to say that as yet Congress has not specifically done so, and, in my opinion, it has not done so by implication.

Before the court can grant the present application of the plaintiff it must decide that it has jurisdiction of the case on the ground that the action is one arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States. In my opinion the action does not so arise, either directly or by fair implication. Therefore I am constrained to hold that this court has not jurisdiction of the action, and it necessarily follows that the present application must be denied.

In view of the foregoing, it becomes unnecessary to decide or to discuss the other questions involved in the application.

Dated October 2, 1915.

WILBUR F. BOOTH, Judge.

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business—the Philippines government bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Nebraska is not debatable.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask unanimous consent to say a few words.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the Senator from Nevada saying a few words? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I hope the motion made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] will be defeated, because the regular order is the consideration of the calendar. When the calendar was last before the Senate we were in the consideration of the joint resolution providing for the appointment of a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress to inquire into interstate commerce. That matter has been dragging along for two or three days, but it will take only half an hour, or three-quarters of an hour, to conclude it, according to my present advices. I hope, therefore, that the regular order will be pursued.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 381.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 381) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I offered the amendment which is now before the Senate as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas. Various amendments have been proposed to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. That Senator himself has had printed a different amendment, which, as I understand, he desires to substitute for his original amendment. Under the parliamentary procedure of the Senate none of these amendments are in order until the substitute which I have offered shall have been disposed of. I have, however, no disposition to prevent the consideration of these various amendments, and it may be that upon their presentation and consideration the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas may be so modified that it will meet with my approval. I therefore feel constrained at the present time to withdraw my amendment, with the statement that later on I may reintroduce it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I had intended to give my views regarding this bill at some length. It is a most inviting field for discussion, but it has been considered from every viewpoint, and I shall not take much of the time of the Senate. In view of the votes I am going to cast, however, I deem a word of explanation proper.

I have no serious objections to the bill itself. Practically everybody in the Philippines seems to think some legislation of this character should be enacted now. I would be glad to vote for it standing alone.

I am unalterably opposed, however, to the preamble which pledges us to give the Filipinos their independence when we think it will be for their permanent benefit. While I believe it would be well for us when the Philippines shall be established as an absolutely independent nation, the time for that is not now. The preamble admits this fact, and those who know the situation know this to be a fact. The interests of the Filipinos should not alone determine the time for their separation from us. Our interests are at least of equal importance, and should not be disregarded, as they are in this pledge.

This problem is to be solved in the future, and future legislators should not be hampered or embarrassed by unnecessary action on our part. Let us solve the problems that confront us and leave them to solve their problems in their own way. No declaration with reference to independence is necessary now. It should not be made. It can only do harm. Wisdom, justice, and patriotism will not die with us. Future legislators will be just as wise and just as patriotic as we are. The conditions that will confront those who must deal definitely and directly with the question of independence may be entirely different from those which now confront us.

We have a striking illustration now of how quickly a change may be wrought in our public affairs and in our opinions and judgments. On December 8, 1914, a little over a year ago, the President of the United States was telling us in clear, classic, but emphatic language, not to get excited over war preparation, and that there was no need of changing the policy which we had been pursuing, while now, according to press reports, he is going to start out on a campaign of education to convince the people of the country that we are in danger from attack, that we lack adequate military preparation, and that immediate war preparation should be made. That message of December 8, 1914, was very unwise, if he is right now, and can only be a source of embarrassment.

These propositions regarding independence, in my judgment, Mr. President, would not be presented now except for the partisan declarations that have been made in political platforms heretofore framed in political conventions to meet what were thought to be existing partisan conditions, and largely through the influence of that gentleman who is now apparently considerably discredited within the ranks of his own party. They are here not in response to a sentiment from the Philippines, but because of these political platform promises. Let us not make the same mistake concerning the Philippines that the President made regarding preparedness. Let us not embarrass future legislative bodies or executive officers by unnecessary legislative compacts or unwise declarations regarding future action. I shall vote against the whole measure if the preamble is kept in or if any promise with reference to future independence is included in the bill.

I shall vote against any amendment looking to the neutralization of the islands through agreements with foreign countries. At first I was favorably impressed with this suggestion, but reflection has convinced me that it is fraught with the greatest of danger to us. This is a most inopportune time to attempt such negotiations. To suggest such treaties is to show our suspicion and distrust, and might, with some reason, be taken by certain countries as a national affront, and especially by the nation against which we are unwisely almost daily voicing our fear and suspicion.

Even if other nations were willing to enter into such a treaty, it would only mean trouble and danger for us to become a party to it. We want no entangling alliances about the Philippines. We should keep control of them until we are satisfied they are ready for independence, and then, if we want to withdraw our sovereignty, we should do so without any strings attached to our action. The only wise course for us to pursue is to continue the good work that we have been doing in the discharge of an unsought duty and maintain our sovereignty there until we believe it is for their best interests and ours that they be freed from our sovereignty, and then give them that freedom. Let them then take their place among the free and independent sovereignties of the world and work out their own destiny in their own way and without any obligations whatever upon our part to protect or defend them. I can not conceive of any relation more unwise or more dangerous for us than the maintenance of a protectorate over the Philippine Islands. It would impose upon us the burdens and dangers of sovereignty without the power or opportunity of avoiding or preparing to meet them.

We have done a marvelous work in the Philippines. No nation in the world's history can point to a similar achievement. We freed them from the bondage of Spain. We took their multitude of tribes, some savage and some semisavage, speaking many different dialects, and are making of them a homogeneous people. Savagery is being eradicated. order is maintained, the principles of free government are being applied, and self-government established. Splendid roads have been constructed, a splendid public-school system established, sanitary measures perfected, agricultural development encouraged, and everything is being done to give these people self-government, and not only fit them for self-government but for independence. Let us not endanger this good work by prophetic declarations that can only hamper and embarrass future patriotic Congresses and lead to dissension, disorder, and insurrection in the islands and dangerous complications with other nations.

Mr. President, I find on my desk this morning an amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. A hasty reading of it leads me to look upon it as the best proposition that has been submitted thus far, if this Congress proposes to take any action at all with reference to the independence of the Philippine Islands. That amendment does provide for a certain and definite course.

If Congress is satisfied that the Philippines are ready for independence and that they want independence, then, I would say, let us give it to them and establish them as a separate government and withdraw entirely from the islands. My position is that we ought to stay there as long as it is necessary for us to stay there, in our interest and theirs, and in the discharge of the duty which I think rests upon us, and then, when we get out, get out entirely, leaving them to take their place among the nations of the earth to work out their own destiny as best they can. I do not think that time has come. They are not ready or fitted for independence. Our duty is not fully discharged.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, as I understand, the pending question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. Am I correct about that?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, let us clear up that matter. I understand that several substitutes or amendments to the amendment which I proposed have been offered; among others, one by the Senator from Iowa. Of course I have no preference as to the order in which the several propositions shall be considered. I do not know which one is before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that they have been printed and are on the table, but have not been formally offered.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I take it for granted that the last amendment I offered is formally before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The substituted amendment of the Senator from Arkansas is formally before the Senate, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] having withdrawn the amendment submitted by him.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Let me inquire if it is a fact that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has offered a substitute?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not offered it. The Senator from Iowa has had it printed, but has not offered it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then I am correct in saying that the pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Chair so informs me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is the substituted amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I desire to say a word or two with reference to the amendment, and incidentally with reference to some other matters that are under discussion in connection with the Philippine bill.

I am one of those who have always believed that from the point of view of the United States it is unfortunate that we have the responsibility for the Philippine Islands upon our hands. But a nation, like an individual, sometimes has a responsibility which is unfortunate, which constitutes a great burden, but of which the nation, like the individual, can not decently rid itself.

Mr. President, we engaged in war with Spain upon the theory that she was unfit to govern in Cuba. As a necessary part of the prosecution of that war our fleet under Commodore, now Admiral, Dewey went to Manila, and there sank and destroyed the Spanish fleet. The destruction of the Spanish fleet, and the subsequent taking over of the city of Manila, practically put an end to the Spanish government there. It put an end to the only responsible government in the Philippine Islands. There were Americans there—few in number at that time, it is true. There were citizens of the various countries of Europe who had settled in the Philippine Islands and engaged in business; and in addition to our responsibility with reference to the natives of the islands we had certain very clear duties to perform with reference to these foreign citizens.

That being so, it became obligatory upon us to set up a government in the Philippine Islands, which we did. I have said that I think it was unfortunate that we were obliged to do that; but if we will look at the situation for a moment we must all admit that it was an absolute necessity.

What were the courses open to the United States at that time? First, we could have turned the islands back to Spain when we concluded the treaty of peace with that Government. Second, we could have turned the islands over to some other country than Spain. Third, we could have permitted the people of the islands to set up an independent government of their own, and ourselves have withdrawn. And, fourth, we could retain possession and set up a responsible government of our own.

It is perfectly apparent that the first course was entirely unthinkable. We had engaged in a war with Spain upon the theory that she was unfit to govern in Cuba. Surely, if she was unfit to govern in Cuba she was unfit to govern in the Philippines. So that that alternative was at once dismissed as entirely out of the question.

Second, we could have turned the islands, as I have said, over to some other country. I have no doubt that at that time England would have been glad to take them; Japan would have been glad to take them; almost any other country would have been glad to take them over. But for us to have taken that course would have been to invite friction and trouble and quarrels among those countries.

Third, we could have turned the islands over to the people themselves, but everybody who was familiar with the situation agreed that the people of the Philippine Islands were utterly incapable of carrying on a government of their own. So we accepted the fourth alternative, not as being a thing that it was pleasing for us to do but as being, under the circumstances, the only thing that we could do.

We have been in possession of the Philippine Islands for 17 years. On the whole, I think that no nation, no people in the history of the world has ever performed for a dependent people a greater service, a more altruistic service, than the people of the United States have performed for the people of the Philippine Islands. I think, on the whole, we have been there for their good. They are in far better condition to-day than they ever have been before, and in far better condition, I confidently believe, than they possibly could have been under any other disposition of the islands.

I am not going to recount the story. We have built schoolhouses, we have been educating the children, we have built good roads, we have extended to the people of the Philippine Islands just as rapidly as it was possible and safe to do so the principles and the opportunities of self-government; and the question now arises, What is the wise thing to do for the future?

And, Mr. President, it is not only a question as to what is the wise thing to do, but it is a question as to what is the righteous thing to do under all the circumstances. A nation, like an individual, may be obliged to carry a burden for the sake of righteousness. Responsibilities comes to nations as they come to individuals. Every individual who is strong and self-reliant is obliged to take upon himself burdens which he would be glad to get rid of if he could do so consistently with the performance of duty; and so we must consider that phase of the subject in dealing with the Philippine Islands.

If we turn them over to the people themselves, we can not escape moral responsibility for our act any more than the Levite could escape by passing by on the other side. We are there, and if we withdraw from those people the strength of this Government, the upholding hand of this Government, and disaster follows, we are morally responsible for it.

I do not know when the Philippine Islands will be ready for self-government; but I feel quite sure that they never will be ready for independence until they are ready for self-government. Independence without the ability to carry on an orderly government would be a mockery.

What has been the situation? What is the situation to-day? There are three races of people settled in these islands, speaking different languages and dialects. I do not know how many there are. I do not know that anybody knows how many different languages are spoken in the islands. The people range from a degree of barbarism and savagery up to a very high degree of civilization. Among the Tagalogs, of course, there are men of intelligence, who are capable of carrying on the affairs of a government; but they have to deal with all these other people, millions of people who are utterly incapable of discharging the duties of citizenship.

If, under these circumstances, we withdraw from the islands and allow the people to set up an independent government of their own, it seems to me perfectly obvious that it will be only a matter of a year or two, perhaps a month or two, until they will be at each other's throats. They are not only of different races and of different languages but they are of different religions. There are the people in the south part of the archipelago who are Mohammedans, and the people in the northern part who call themselves Christians. For centuries those people have been in strife with one another. The people of the south have been fitting out expeditions and going up into the north and making war. To me it is perfectly evident that the moment the authority and power of the United States is withdrawn that condition will reassert itself; and the final result will be, without multiplying words about it, that a condition of anarchy will prevail throughout the islands. The situation will be that the Philippine government will constitute an international nuisance that some strong nation or some strong nations will feel obliged to suppress; and the final result will be that some strong nation will take possession of the islands, and the last lot of the Filipinos will be far worse than their first.

This preamble that has been incorporated in the proposed law recites that—

Whereas it is desirable to place in the hands of the people of the Philippines such an increasing control of their domestic affairs as can be given them without in the meantime impairing the sovereignty of the United States, in order that, by the use and exercise of popular franchise and governmental powers, they may be better prepared to fully assume the responsibilities and enjoy all the privileges of complete independence—which it is the purpose of the United States to grant.

What is meant by "the United States"? Does it mean the people of the United States? If so, the statement is not true. The people of the United States never have signified their purpose or desire to grant independence to the Philippine Islands. On the contrary, whenever they have spoken—and they have spoken upon three or four separate and distinct occasions—they have declared exactly the contrary. Our friends on the other side of the Chamber declared in favor of Philippine independence in 1900, and we joined issue with them and went before the people of the country upon that issue. Mr. Bryan called it the paramount issue of the campaign, and it was so regarded by a great many people who participated in the campaign. At any rate, whether it was the paramount issue or not, it was one of the leading issues of the campaign; and the people of the United States intelligenly passed upon it, and if their votes meant anything they meant that they repudiated the Democratic suggestion that we should withdraw from the Philippine Islands.

The same followed in 1904 and 1908. In 1912 a majority of the people did not speak in support of the Democratic platform, or any part of it. A minority of them—a trifle over 40 per cent—voted to put the Democratic Party into power, and therefore may be said to have approved the Democratic platform. Whenever the people of the country have spoken through a majority in favor of one party or the other they always have repudiated this idea of withdrawing from the Philippine Islands. So it is inaccurate to say that it is the purpose of the United States to do this thing, if we mean, by "the United States," the people of the United States.

But the preamble proceeds—which it is the purpose of the United States to grant when, in the judgment of the United States, it will be to the permanent interest of the people of the Philippine Islands.

What do we mean by that? In the first place, who is to judge of that condition? I suppose that in that connection the words "the United States" mean the Congress of the United States, because that is the only agency of the United States which has the power to speak. It seems to me that such a declaration as that is absolutely certain to invite trouble. I can not conceive of a more mischievous declaration, because, as we all know, in a very short time the people of the islands who desire independence will be declaring that it is for the permanent interest of the people to have independence, and, if Congress is not prepared to agree with them, that means disappointment, ill feeling, and, very likely, insurrection. It means trouble, in any event, and serious trouble.

The declaration is objectionable from another point of view. It is a maxim of law and it is a rule of common sense that the expression of one thing is the exclusion of all other things. We assert here that it is our purpose to grant independence when it will be to the permanent interest of the people of the Philippine Islands. That is equivalent to saying that it is not our purpose to grant independence under any other circumstances or conditions. No matter what may transpire hereafter, no matter how extreme the necessity of getting rid of the islands from the point of view of the United States alone may be, if we are to keep our pledge, we have tied our hands against parting with the Philippines except upon the single condition which is expressed.

So, Mr. President, if the opportunity presents itself, I shall vote to strike out from the bill the preamble as being mischievous and dangerous.

Mr. LIPPITT. Will the Senator from Utah permit me?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. LIPPITT. I am very glad indeed to have the Senator from Utah call attention to that feature of the preamble which seems to deprive the United States from having the power to grant independence to those islands on any other ground except the fact that it may be for the permanent interest of the Philippine Islands. I am not a lawyer myself, and I am very glad indeed to have the Senator from Utah, who is a very eminent lawyer, give his approval to that interpretation of it, because it does seem a very vital thing, in connection with this whole subject, that the United States is depriving itself of acting for its own advantage if it should be necessary at any subsequent time. I only want to express my approval of that view.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course, pledges of that kind can be disregarded hereafter; but I have no doubt in my own mind that that is the proper interpretation of it. So if we can conceive of a case arising hereafter where the people of the Philippine Islands will conclude that it is not to their advantage to separate from the United States, we are bound to remain there if we keep this pledge, no matter how onerous or burdensome it may become for us to do so.

Mr. LIPPITT. I should like to suggest to the Senator that it is not at all impossible that, as the years go by and the interests of the two countries become more closely united, instead of there being a party in the Philippine Islands crying for independence, there will be one there urging us not to abandon them, and they would then have the right to come back upon this preamble and say in substance that we had promised that we would not do it until it was for the benefit of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the people of the Philippine Islands consider the question intelligently and dispassionately, they are bound to come to the conclusion that it is far better for them to remain under the control of the United States Government than it is for them to undertake to carry on a government of their own. I do not know how long it will take to educate the people of the Philippine Islands to the point where independence can safely be intrusted to them. I do not go quite as far as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] did the other day. I do not believe it is a matter of a century; I doubt whether it is a matter of 50 years; but I think it is a matter of at least another generation. Until the new generation has grown up, until they have been educated in the schools which we have established, until the English language has become the predominant language in the islands, I do not believe it is safe to intrust independence to those people.

Some things have been said here with reference to imposing upon those people the English language. To my mind, the greatest blessing that we could confer upon them is to educate them in the English language. It is the language of Anglo-Saxon liberty, the language in which the highest ideals of government have been written, and no people can study and understand that language without understanding to some extent the literature of the language and making a part of themselves those high ideals of government which my reading of history teaches me are the greatest and best that the world has ever seen.

Only 10 per cent of those people to-day are capable, or even measurably capable, of carrying on the operations of self-government. As was said here the other day in the discussion of the Senator from Idaho, if we could imagine a situation where 10 per cent of the people of those islands were educated Americans, even they would be incapable of carrying on a free government with 90 per cent of the people illiterate and many of them barbarians. If it would be impossible for a population of which

10 per cent were Americans to carry on the government, how much more clear is the impossibility of a population consisting of only 10 per cent of educated and capable literate Filipinos doing the same thing?

The thing that keeps the people of those islands together, the thing that makes orderly government possible, and the only thing that does it, is the strong arm of the United States, and I think it is a wicked thing to suggest at this time the idea of withdrawing our strength from those people and leaving them to their own helplessness.

Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] has offered an amendment which, with all due deference to him, I think is a little worse than this preamble. The Senator from Arkansas proposes to authorize and direct the President to withdraw our sovereignty from the islands in not less than two years nor more than four years. If he would stop there, simply making a hard and fast rule that we should get out of the islands and leave them alone, while I should not be in favor of it, I should regard it as preferable to the provisions of this preamble, but he goes further and inserts a proviso which reads:

That if the President, at the expiration of the said period of four years, shall find that the condition of the internal or external affairs of said Philippines in respect to the stability or efficiency of the proposed government thereof is such as to warrant him in so doing, he is hereby further authorized, by proclamation duly made and published, to extend the said time to and including the date of the final adjournment of the session of Congress which shall convene next after the date of the expiration of the said period of four years.

So we do not cut ourselves loose from the Philippine Islands. We authorize the President within two or four years, if he thinks it is the wise thing to do, to withdraw, but it is left entirely in his hands, so far as that part of it is concerned. If at the expiration of four years he concludes—and if he investigates the situation over there in the meantime as thoroughly as he ought to investigate it, in my judgment, he must conclude—that the condition of the internal and the external affairs of the Philippines in respect to the stability or efficiency of the proposed government is not such as to justify immediate independence—if he concludes that, as I say I think he must conclude, then we have simply made an offer of independence to those people with a string to it, which we have pulled back at the end of that time, and the result will be a mischievous situation, quite as bad, and perhaps worse, than that which is invited by the language of the preamble.

In the meantime the Republican Party will come into power again. We know what the view of that party has been. We know what is likely to be the view of the nominee of that party, who will be elected by the people. Suppose he concludes that the situation is such as to demand action under this proviso. Then we shall have invited revolution, insurrection, and bloodshed.

The wise thing to do is to leave them alone, to go on as we have been doing, to keep adding to the schools in the country, to proceed with our education of the people, to keep teaching them the lessons of good government, to extend further and further the principles and opportunities of Anglo-Saxon self-government, to say nothing about independence, but to wait until in God's good time, 30 years hence, 40 years hence, 50 years hence, whenever it may be, that everybody will recognize the fitness of the people for self-government and independence, and then, and not till then, withdraw and let them set up a government of their own, but in the meantime leave the subject of independence alone.

Mr. President, to my mind that is not the most mischievous part of this proposed amendment. It provides further that—

Immediately upon the passage of the act the President shall invite the cooperation of the principal nations interested in the affairs of that part of the world in which the Philippines are located, in the form of a treaty or other character of binding agreement, whereby the cooperating nations shall mutually pledge themselves to recognize and respect the sovereignty and independence of the said Philippines—and also to mutually obligate themselves, equally and not one primarily nor to any greater extent than another, to maintain as against external force the sovereignty of said Philippines.

In other words, we are to invite the other nations of the world, or such of them as may join with us to maintain a protectorate over those islands, to maintain them as against external force from any other country or people. If that can not be done, then the amendment further provides that the United States is to undertake that burden alone.

Now, what does that mean? It means that we are to withdraw from the islands. It means that we are to have no Army there, of course. It means that we are to leave them to their own devices, to carry on their own affairs in their own way, and then if trouble results between them and Japan or between them and Germany or any other country, no matter what the cause of the trouble may be, we must take upon ourselves the burden of defending a country thousands of miles away from our shores against any force that may be exerted by any other country.

In other words, it proposes to extend the Monroe doctrine into Asia. Some of us are looking ahead with more or less apprehension to being obliged some day to defend the Monroe doctrine upon this hemisphere. I believe in maintaining that doctrine upon this hemisphere at all hazards, but I do not believe it is wise to extend it into the Orient and to pledge ourselves to do with reference to the Philippine Islands what I think we would be bound to do with reference to one of the countries in Central or South America. Yet that is the situation in which this proposed amendment will leave us.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does not the Senator think that we are invading the Monroe doctrine in the Orient now in the possession of the Philippines?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No, Mr. President, I do not. We are there in our own right. It is the Government of the United States which is in the Philippine Islands. We are in the Philippine Islands, not by quite as strong a tie but by as clear a right and as great a power as we are in Hawaii.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As we are in Guam and as we are in Porto Rico.

Mr. GALLINGER. Or Alaska.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose Japan would take possession of Mexico and say, "We are there by virtue of our power," I assume the Senator from Utah would think that the Monroe doctrine had been somewhat infringed upon.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why can not Japan say the same thing to us about the Philippines?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The difference is quite obvious. We would invoke the Monroe doctrine while Japan was undertaking to do that. We would not invoke it after Japan has established herself and set up a government there. We do not invoke the Monroe doctrine against the English Government in Canada, because they are there; but if the English Government should undertake to invade one of the independent Republics in Central or South America, then there would arise an occasion for invoking the Monroe doctrine. But, as I have said, we are in the Philippines by the same title and the same power that we are in Guam or Porto Rico. It is not a question of maintaining the Monroe doctrine; it is a question of maintaining our sovereignty in the Philippines.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree that we are there with the same power.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Precisely the same power.

Mr. CUMMINS. The power of conquest. The territory that the United States has, with the exception of Hawaii and Alaska, is the result of conquest.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Undoubtedly. It was the result of war in many cases followed by a treaty which the other people to the treaty were more or less coerced into making.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator speaks of war and conquest. What about the Louisiana Purchase and others of that character?

Mr. CUMMINS. We have the Louisiana territory by the technical title of France. France had no more title to the Louisiana territory than she had to the golden streets of the New Jerusalem, and we had to conquer the territory in order to hold it.

Mr. WARREN. The assertion was made that all our possessions were acquired by us by conquest.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Wyoming is undoubtedly correct. I was speaking of other possessions of the United States. We have acquired territory by purchase. We acquired Alaska, of course, by very peaceful methods.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the Gadsden Purchase.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And the Gadsden Purchase. That is quite true; but we are in the Philippines in our own right, and what we are maintaining is not the Monroe doctrine, but our own sovereignty. But if we withdraw from the Philippines and permit them to set up an independent government, then if we undertake to defend them against force from an outside power we are not doing it by virtue of our sovereignty, but we are doing it by virtue of having extending a protectorate over them, and by virtue of having extended something in the nature of the Monroe doctrine into Asia.

Mr. President, I think that is a very dangerous burden for us to take upon ourselves; I think it is a very unnecessary burden. Suppose that a condition should arise in the Philippine Islands such as I indicated a moment ago, that there should be domestic disturbances resulting in revolution. Whatever others may think about it, in my judgment that will be the result. If Mexico can not carry on a government of its own, if revolution is the normal condition of affairs there, surely a people who are, if anything, less capable of self-government, must bring themselves to the same unhappy pass. There is bound to be revolution; there is bound to be bloody revolution in the Philippine Islands whenever we withdraw our power and our protecting arm from them; it is inevitable, as I view the situation. Suppose that condition arises and Japan, a near neighbor, says, "We can not tolerate that condition; we can not permit the Philippine Islands to make an international nuisance of themselves, to be disturbing the international peace, and we will put an end to it." No matter how strong the excuse might be for the intervention of Japan or of any other country, we shall have bound ourselves by this solemn agreement to engage in a bloody and costly war. It is the same condition that might exist if some European country had agreed to maintain Mexico against the intervention of any other country. In such an event, no matter how much violence multiplied in Mexico, we would be powerless to intervene, except at the cost of a war with the power that had guaranteed to protect them. Do we want to put ourselves in that position in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator from Utah is now addressing himself to the criticism of the proposition that this Government shall guarantee the independence of the Philippine Islands for five years after we have retired from the islands.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That means nine years from the date of the passage of this bill, if it passes.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I understand the amendment as now drafted provides for four years.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, add five years to it, and that makes nine years.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; you add two years to it under the provision that the President may extend the time until the end of the following Congress, which might be six years.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment, the amendment provides that "guaranty" shall be given "on behalf of the United States alone for the period of five years from and after the expiration of said period of four years, or any extension thereof."

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; it means a guaranty of five years after we have retired from the islands.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then I am correct in saying it is nine years.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; it is nine years, including the time before we retire and the time we guarantee the independence of the islands.

Mr. President, I understand the party to which the Senator from Utah belongs, while they do not believe in the immediate surrender of our control of the Philippines, have at all times held out to the Filipino people the hope and expectation that when, in the judgment of this Government, they were prepared for self-government this Government would withdraw from the islands. I take it that the Senator believes that policy should be pursued.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is my own judgment about it.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the Senator's own judgment. Now, if the Senator's party should come into the control of the Government hereafter—and I hope that time may be long in the future—and should decide that the time had arrived to set the Filipino people free, would the Senator from Utah insist that this Government had no obligation to extend to them some protection for any period of time whatever?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Utah insists absolutely upon that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me ask the Senator, before he answers that——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me finish my reply to the Senator. So long as we are there, we are under the gravest responsibility to protect those people against outside force; to give them a good government; to give them the very best government of which we are capable; but when they are ready for independence and we are ready to get out, then my position is that we have no further obligation; we shall recognize them as a sovereign nation, equal in the eyes of international law to the greatest nation in the world, and we shall not owe them the duty of protecting them after having recognized a status of that character.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, let me suggest to the Senator from Utah, would it not lead to this situation: During this period of preparation for self-government the Philippine Islands would be under the control and dominion of the United States; the Filipinos would have no powers or functions of government that we did not see fit to accord to them; it would be our Government; it would be our control. When they are turned loose and our control ceases, would they not find themselves without an army, without a navy, without a regularly established government of their own; and during the period when they were organizing and getting ready for defense in case of invasion, would we not leave them, carrying out the policies of the Senator's own party, in a very pitiable and helpless condition? Does not the Senator from Utah think that ordinary generosity, ordinary fair treatment, and justice to those people, would appeal to us to stand sponsor for their independence; to stand between them and external invasion until at least they could prepare themselves measurably for defending their own rights and their own territory?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, my position is that the Philippine Islands——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator please, if we should withdraw to-day from the Philippine Islands, would we not leave them absolutely helpless, absolutely unable to defend themselves, because they have had no control, they have had no opportunity to organize for defense, either by way of providing a navy or providing an army? They have neither, and they can not have either, until we have withdrawn and given them an opportunity to provide them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, what I have been insisting on all the time is that we ought not to withdraw from the Philippine Islands until the Filipinos are capable; that we ought not to take that step.

Mr. SIMMONS. They might be capable of self-government, if the Senator will pardon me; you may hold them until they are capable, if they ever can qualify themselves, and then turn them loose, and with all their capacity they would still be helpless, because until the moment of our surrender of American control they would have had no opportunity to provide for their protection.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the capacity for self-government is not the only thing that is required. I would not leave them until they were not only able to govern themselves from the standpoint of intelligence and ability, but not until by having set up under our guidance their self-governing institutions and prepared for their own defense they were able to care for themselves. I would not leave them until they were in that situation. But my point is that whenever the time comes that we are ready to withdraw upon the theory that they are to be recognized as an independent and sovereign nation, the time has come to get rid of all our responsibility, and we should be responsible after that time for the Philippine Islands in no greater or different sense than we are responsible for China or any other country with which we have never heretofore had the relations that we have had with the Philippine Islands.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Utah probably knows, and I think the Senator from North Carolina knows but has overlooked the fact, that we are preparing them now. We have in the Philippines an army of scouts who are being educated for war, and they amount now to many thousands, including those now in the service and those who have been discharged from time to time from the service after having received the military education and training afforded. There is also a competent and powerful constabulary force in the islands; and in addition we are fortifying the islands. We are fortifying them very thoroughly and heavily; we are putting in the same kind of defenses—in fact, I might say superior defenses to those we are installing in our own or mother country. I might also say that we have gone so far amongst the communities of the south which have been referred to, the Moros for instance, as to form companies, and almost regiments, of native scouts, which are to-day defending the southern part of the archipelago. The island of Mindanao has no white troops now, but is defended by native troops.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I so understand the situation.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from Utah will pardon me, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wyoming if the constabulary and scouts are not merely a police force? We are not organizing the Filipinos into an army for the purpose of defense against external invasion.

Mr. WARREN. As to the constabulary, yes; as to the scouts, no. The scouts are an army. I wish to say, if the Senator from Utah will permit me—— .

Mr. SIMMONS. But, if the Senator will pardon me, before he turns his attention to the Senator from Utah, as he in part addressed his remarks to me, are we providing them with any navy?

Mr. WARREN. Not so far.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is not a navy the chief reliance the island people would require in case of invasion? Are they not situated very much like the British Isles are situated? Their defense is dependent entirely upon the size and strength of their navy, and they have recognized that fact in their traditional policy. Are not the people in the Philippine Islands in the same situation and would it do any good to turn the islands over to them, so far as their protection is concerned, even if they did have a small army, if they had no navy?

Mr. WARREN. A navy is largely an attacking force. We are already providing in the Philippines, as I have said, harbor defenses of a character that can be no more than equaled in any other country; certainly they are not surpassed. We have not built them a navy; in fact, we have not built our own beyond a defensive strength and hardly up to that. The Philippines must depend always, as we do, largely upon fortifications.

If the Senator from Utah will allow me, I should like to say a few words now, because I have to leave the Chamber soon in connection with duties as a member of a subcommittee engaged in important work. I intended to cover some of the ground which the Senator from Utah is so well covering. I suggest we had better think and plan a little further whether we have the Army and the Navy to make good our guaranty, if made as proposed in the Clarke amendment. Now, according to that, we propose to withdraw the Army and Navy from the Philippine Islands and then to be held in suspense for a certain number of years to respond when called upon to make our guaranty good. We are now there with a very considerable Army and some portion of the Navy. We are bound to have an Army and a Navy. The difference in expense is in supporting it there and here. It is a matter of nominal additional expense to support the force that we now have there during the time that the islands are in our charge, but when we leave the Philippines, leave them alone and independent, and then are called upon to make good the guaranty, what kind of a figure will we cut with Japan or some distant foreign country that may propose to annex the Philippines or to overrun them?

That is a matter to be thought of. Our Army now is confessedly too small, but no matter how large we may make it, no matter how far we may go along the path of preparedness, we do not expect to have an army of occupation in a country seven thousand or more miles away, as it would be essential to have if we undertook to requite the wrongs of that nation if attacked by another country.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator is quite right in his observations, and I entirely agree with him.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I want to remark, in reply to what the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has said, that, as I understand the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina, we would be under some moral obligation to the Filipino people to protect them internationally until they had organized and established an army and a navy sufficient for their own protection, or at least to give them a reasonable time to do so; and he suggested that would be five years, or that the five-year period mentioned in this bill would enable them to do that. I think, if the Senator from North Carolina will reflect for a moment upon the actual conditions, that he will not entertain any such idea. It is perfectly obvious, it seems to me, that the Filipino people never will be able in any length of time to establish an army or a navy that could make any respectable showing whatever in any international conflict that they might have with any of the great military powers which we have in view as parties to the agreement that is proposed here. Against Japan or Germany or Great Britain the Filipino people would never be able to protect themselves.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hope the Senator from North Carolina will be brief, because I wish to conclude.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will be brief. I do not think the Senator from Washington could have possibly understood me to mean in anything I have said that I thought the Filipino people would be able in many, many years after they are set free to provide an army and a navy sufficient to protect them against such a power as Great Britain or Germany or Japan. The thought I had in mind, and what I intended to suggest, was that the Filipino people before we went into the islands had been for a long period of time under the control of Spain. Since we have been there they have been under our control, and they will remain under our control until we leave there. When we do leave there they will have no government of their own; they will have to organize and establish one; they will have no army; they will have no navy; and it does seem to me that it would be rather a hard measure for us to take those people, who have never had an opportunity to establish a government or provide for defense, and after having held them suddenly to turn them loose so as to be the prey of the nations without any capacity or opportunity to prepare for their own defense. That was the only thought that I desired to emphasize.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina has demonstrated conclusively what a wicked thing it is to adopt this provision and to undertake to put the people of the Philippine Islands upon their own responsibility. He pictures them as a helpless people, incapable of defending themselves against other nations, which is all quite true. The people of the Philippine Islands ought not to be permitted to set up an independent government of their own and take their place in the family of nations until they have reached the point where we do not need to extend a protectorate over them. The very fact that you admit that we have got to defend them, look after them, and keep them in leading strings after they have obtained independence demonstrates that those people are not fit for independence now and will not be fit for independence in four years.

Mr. President, suppose the people of the Philippine Islands get into a quarrel with Japan, are we to go over there and engage side by side with them in a war on that country, no matter what the circumstances may be, whether Japan be right or wrong? Suppose that the conditions of the Philippine Islands, with respect to the treatment of the citizens of Japan, in six or seven years from now shall be as deplorable as the conditions in Mexico are with reference to our citizens, and Japan, as a great civilized power, believes that her national honor demands that she shall intervene for the protection of her own people and for the sake of civilization, the Senator from North Carolina would still have us intervene, go 7,000 miles across the sea with our Army and our Navy, and sacrifice the lives of our citizens in a cause, however bad it might turn out to be. I am not in favor of such a course.

Mr. President, just a word or two more and I am through. A good deal has been said from time to time about the Philippines being a source of weakness to us. I think in a sense that is true; but I think the danger to be apprehended has been greatly exaggerated. I do not think, for example, there is 1 chance in 100, so long as we maintain our place in the Philippine Islands, of Japan undertaking to take the Philippines from us.

In the first place, the Japanese expansion does not lie in that direction. I am informed, and I think credibly informed, that they have no idea of colonizing their people in that direction at all. In addition to that, I suspect that any attempt upon the part of Japan to invade the Philippine Islands would be very vigorously objected to by Great Britain, because to-day the feeling in Australia against Japanese settlement is quite as intense as it is upon the Pacific coast. The Australian people do not want Japanese immigration any more than the people of the Pacific coast desire it. With that feeling upon the part of that great English colony, I should imagine that it would be the desire of Great Britain to keep the Philippine Islands in the condition they now are, where, to some degree, they constitute a buffer between Japan and the English possessions.

So I do not think we are running any great risk in the future, any more than we have run in the past, by retaining the Philippines. That they never will become a source of great profit to us, I am quite willing to agree. That they will always be a burden upon us, I think is a good deal more than likely. Nevertheless, I believe it to be the duty of this great country, having once set its hand to the plow, to hold it there until the furrow has been plowed to the end.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I quite agree with the Senator with relation to the feeling of Japan in regard to the Philippine Islands at the present time; but I believe that that feeling toward the United States has become friendly by reason of the fact that it has been repeatedly affirmed that our intention was not to hold the Philippine Islands permanently. Japan has a policy toward the Orient just exactly as we have toward the Western Hemisphere. Any aggression upon the part of any Government in the Orient is repugnant to her, as much so as the acquisition of any territory on this hemisphere is to the United States.

I have not any doubt that 15 or 16 years ago, when we first acquired the Philippine Islands, Japan thought it was an act of aggression on our part; but since that time, having been assured by the repeated declarations of Governors General of the islands that it was not our intention to hold them permanently, I believe their conduct has been in the direction of friendship toward us.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I quite understand that feeling on the part of Japan, and am able to sympathize with it. I can quite understand the feeling of resentment that a great power like Japan would have if they should regard our operations in the Philippines as an intrusion into the affairs of the Orient, just as we would regard a similar act on the part of Japan over here as an intrusion upon our domain.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But, Mr. President, I will say to the Senator, that if it were manifest to Japan that we intended to hold the Philippine Islands forever, or for any great period of time, that would indicate that we never intended to give them up, I believe that that hostile feeling would again arise in the minds of the Japanese people.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I am not in favor of holding the Philippine Islands forever, and I do not think the great majority of the American people are in favor of doing it, but I am in favor of leaving that subject alone, because the discussion of it and a declaration upon the subject is a mischief-making thing. The difference between the attitude of the Senator from Colorado and my attitude about it is that we are both in favor, when the proper time comes, of letting the Philippine Islands go, but the Senator wants to make a declaration about it. When he declares to the people of the Philippine Islands that they will be permitted to set up an independent government when they are ready for it he immediately invites them to say they are ready for it now or ready for it in a year, and that brings on a contest. Let the whole subject alone until the condition has arrived, and act, but make no promises in advance.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The difficulty with the situation, with respect to the Filipinos, is their desire to become independent immediately. If we make an indefinite declaration, or no promise at all, it will make a feeling of unrest right now, because they fear that there is an intention upon the part of the United States to hold them forever, or for an indefinite term; hence we would get more discord, more conflict, more antagonistic feeling, and perhaps insurrection, if we should deny to them a promise of their independence.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; and the Senator's party is responsible for that condition. If the Senator's party had been self-contained and had not been making these declarations in years past, the people of the Philippine Islands would not have felt as they do feel about it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, Mr. President, what has been responsible for this feeling is an instrument that was written 139 years ago, which declared that in order to attain the ends of the inalienable rights of man governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. Every time a Filipino reads that declaration there comes the feeling upon his part that he should have a right to govern himself according to our own standard.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, Mr. President, I have read that declaration many times and I have heard it thundered in many forums, but, after all, the question of self-government is a good deal more a matter of ability than it is of right. In a certain sense every human being has the right of self-government, but for the sake of those with whom he is obliged to associate it ought not to be accorded to him until he is capable of exercising the powers of self-government.

Why, Mr. President, the Declaration of Independence extended over the Indians in this country; and yet we kept them, hundreds of thousands of them, in subjection for a good many generations, because we thought that while in some remote sense they had a right to self-government, they were not capable of governing themselves. The two things must coexist—the right of self-government and the ability as well.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUSTING in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Just for a question. I want to finish, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will not interrupt the Senator, then.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; if the Senator wishes to ask a question I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I was just going to suggest to the Senator, in answer to what was said by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], that I do not believe the Declaration of Independence had reference to the Indians. I do not think it had reference to any race in America except the Caucasians. The man who wrote that declaration was a slaveholder.

With reference to the Filipinos, however, the Senator will recall the fact that three-quarters of a century ago, or quite half a century before the Spanish fleet was sunk in Manila Bay, before the Americans had anything to do with the islands, there were revolutions in the Philippine Islands, and some of the utterances by their leader indicated a very profound sense of right and accurate idea as to government.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator let me interrupt him right there to ask him a question?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Yes, sir; I will.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator, I think, had very high regard for the ability of Booker Washington and some others of his race who had reached a high degree of intelligence. Does the Senator think that makes the negro race capable of self-government?

Mr. VARDAMAN. As a matter of fact, you know, it was not the negro race in Booker Washington that gave him the capacity to understand any sort of a government. As John J. Ingalls, of Kansas, said of Fred Douglass, it was the Anglo-Saxon reinforcement that gave him his mentality.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator does not answer my question. Does he think the negro race are capable of self-government?

Mr. VARDAMAN. From the standpoint of a white man, absolutely I do not. The negro has never anywhere shown sustained power for self-development or self-government. His present civilization in America is due to white domination, and the continuation of his civilization in America will depend upon the white man's control.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; notwithstanding the fact that there are among them many men who are very intelligent.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is true; but I would be very much opposed to the United States going into Haiti, or any other country that belonged to the negro race, and taking their government away from them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is not the question.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If they could participate in the government of the United States without absolutely destroying the civilization of the white man, I should not be so much against it here. But we have tried it, and we find that the negro can live and prosper under the white man's government, whereas under the negro government, or even with the negro sharing it with the white man, the white man can not live.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But the Senator thinks, because José Rizal was a great patriot and a very intelligent man, who knew something about the affairs of government, and because a small percentage of the other people of the islands were of that character, that the Moros and the savages and the head-hunters are capable of self-government? Or does he want to set up an autocracy over there? Does he want to have a few of the Tagalogs governing the remainder of the people who are themselves incapable of self-government?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will answer the Senator. I do not think they are capable of self-government as we understand it and practice it in America. Very few races in all the world's history have shown the power or capacity to govern themselves as the Americans and English do; but I do think they are capable of maintaining a government good enough for them. While I admit that the government of the Filipino by the American would not materially injure the Filipino, it would necessarily injure the American. It would injure any free government or republic that exercised that arbitrary, usurped power which we exercise in the Philippine Islands. I am in favor of "safety first." I want to get out more for the good of this Republic than I do for the good of the Filipinos. We are not going to share with the Filipino our Constitution, and we should not; but to withhold the Constitution from the Filipino while we hold him as a subject will surely do violence to our Constitution. I repeat, I am very much more interested in taking care of our own country, Government, and people than playing the rôle of guardian for the outside world.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, no country and no people ever will be injured by discharging a duty in the spirt in which the American people have discharged their duty to the Filipinos.

I have finished what I desire to say, Mr. President, except that I want to speak just a word with reference to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. That is a straightforward, understandable proposition. I do not agree with it, because, as I have already said, I am in favor of retaining our place in the Philippines for a good many years yet to come without making any declaration at all upon the subject. But if we are going to get rid of them at all, we ought to get rid of them in the way proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, which is simply a straightforward declaration that we shall recognize them as an independent nation after we have submitted the question to a vote of their people and they have determined that they want to occupy that status; when that has been done, that we shall withdraw not only our Army and our Navy but all responsibility for their future, and let them take care of themselves. If we are to withdraw, that is the way to do it. But so long as we bear the responsibility of their defense we should maintain our effective control.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I have already spoken at considerable length on the original bill. As an excuse for asking the indulgence of the Senate now I simply wish to say that I feel deeply the importance and the seriousness of the questions involved in these proposed amendments. I hope I do not take the subject too seriously, nor myself too seriously, in this matter. I think of the latter I have never yet been accused. I recall that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] last evening said that it was a most serious and important question, and that it should have the very careful attention of every Senator here.

I confess, Mr. President, that after the discussion so far, and after hearing certain statements made by Senators on this side of the Chamber, I feel almost like one who is engaged with those who are leading a forlorn hope in opposition to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I am convinced, however, that either in the original bill or in this proposed amendment, if enacted into law, we are making a great national mistake.

We sit here, it seems to me, taking counsel day after day, not of our courage, not of our confidence in the rectitude of our intentions toward the Philippines, not, it seems to me sometimes, with the high sense of duty that we ought to feel, but, rather, taking counsel of our fears and of our misgivings and of a somewhat worn-out pledge in a party platform, which had its inception, to begin with, in the necessity for a campaign issue 16 years ago.

And thus influenced we are forgetting many and most important considerations. We are forgetting the success of this Nation in the past in its acquisition and government of insular territory, its unqualified success down to the present time. We are forgetting that.

Furthermore, Mr. President, we are forgetting another thing. We are forgetting, as I believe, the tremendous material, commercial, and trade advantages that are to result by our retention of the Philippines until at least the Filipinos are capable of self-government. We are forgetting that.

Third, Mr. President, we are forgetting what is more important, to my mind, than every other consideration, and that is our responsibility, our moral obligation, toward the 8,000,000 inhabitants of the Philippine Islands.

As I hear this discussion go on and see so many Members of this body ready to cut loose from the Philippines and send them adrift it would seem that we have forgotten altogether that old principle of chivalry, noblesse oblige, nobility compels. We are now, in our anxiety to get rid of the Philippine Islands, forgetting that great principle, and to my mind, Mr. President, it is a principle that should appeal to our sense of duty as a great Nation toward a weak, and I may say on the whole and in the mass an illiterate people, that through the fortunes of war came into our possession and under our control 17 years ago, and in this view it ought to appeal to our Americanism—our patriotism.

Mr. President, I wish briefly to refer to some of the advantages arising out of our possession and retention of the Philippines. It has been urged on this floor that we should get rid of the Philippines, not simply out of consideration for the Filipinos but that we should get rid of them for the good of the American people. I think I can demonstrate otherwise, and that it will not be for the material benefit, at least of the American people, to be rid of these islands.

In the first place, Mr. President, the expense of the Philippine Islands to us has been greatly exaggerated. The chairman of the committee having the bill in charge and other Senators speaking for the bill have been unable to give definite statistics as to the annual expense of the Philippines to the United States Government; it varies all the way from $7,000,000 to $25,000,000 a year. With the administration of the civil government of the Philippines, carried on by and through revenues derived from the Philippines themselves, my judgment is that the lower number—$7,000,000—comes nearer the truth as to the actual expense of the Philippines to the United States.

Mr. President, there is another consideration with reference to that actual expense, whatever it is. Most of that, of course, is for the maintenance of an army of about 12,000 men in the Philippine Islands, but who can say what portion of that army of 12,000 men, if they were not in the Philippines, would not be in the service of the United States Government somewhere else than in the islands? So it is not fair and you can not consistently and truly charge the expense of the army in the Philippines to the holding and retention of the Philippine Islands.

Again, it has been said here on the floor of this Chamber that there is the expense of the Navy; but who can say and who has said that a single ship has been built for service in Philippine waters or because of our retention of the Philippines? I know, so far as the Army is concerned, there has been no time within the last three years when it would not have been said that we should have here on the continent, in addition to what we have, the number of soldiers now in the Philippine Islands. Had they been here they would have been in the service of the Government and would have formed, without being in the Philippine Islands, a part of the Regular Army of the United States with their thousand or more dollars a year of expense per man to the Government. So it is evident this matter of expense of the Philippine Islands, confined principally to military affairs and to our military establishment there, as it is, has been greatly exaggerated.

Let me speak for a moment of the commercial advantages. Admitting that there might be yet an expense for the maintenance of a military establishment in the Philippines, the participation in the commerce of the Philippine Islands on the part of American citizens, American manufacturers, American exporters will more than compensate the people of the United States for the expense caused by such military establishment. As showing the advantages of the Philippine Islands from a commercial standpoint, I wish to read the editorial heading to an article entitled "Getting into the Philippines," by Patrick Gallagher, editor of the Far Eastern Bureau, found in the Philippine Monthly for September, 1915:

"GETTING INTO THE PHILIPPINES."

[By Patrick Gallagher, editor of the Far Eastern Bureau.]

(Mr. Gallagher, well known to all Manila old-timers as the founder and first editor of the Philippine Free Press, was the guest of the New York Rotary Club at the Hofbrau House on the eve of "Occupation Day." His address, which was reported very fully in most of the newspapers throughout the United States, has evoked much favorable editorial comment. The Boston Transcript said on August 17: "Regarding the Philippines, which we now have possessed during 17 years, the popular mind has been like a child's mind, which peoples the silence and vivifies the night with goblins. 'Wish we were out of the Philippines,' is an expression confined to no one school of partisan political thought, and it is refreshing to find a happy rejoinder coming from the editor of the Far Eastern Bureau, that rejoinder being, 'But we are not yet in the islands.' Americans have found difficulty in projecting their understanding over the leagues of sea, and opinion is swayed by imaginings rather than by a realizing grasp of things as they are. Commercially we have 'barely scratched the foreshore' of the hithermost Philippine land. 'We ought to see,' remarks this critic, 'that our famous open-door policy in the East is useless to us if we fail to utilize that doorstep to the open door, the Philippines.' * * * 'Manila,' he points out, 'should serve as the base mart for serving millions of customers throughout the Orient.' Yet this doorstep of the open door grows mossy and we spend our time worrying lest some one else will want to put foot on it and use it. Militarily the position is about the same. We are neither in nor out of the Philippines, as, for example, we are positively and defensively in Panama."—Editor the Philippine Monthly.)

Yet, Mr. President, notwithstanding the surface has been barely scratched, as this writer says, our trade with the Philippine Islands grew from $120,000 or a little over in 1898 to $27,000,000 in 1914, and at that rate the years, I think, will be but few—10, 15, 20 years—until we can count upon our trade as being valued in the hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. Did the Senator give that as our export trade or the combined trade of the islands both in imports and exports?

Mr. STERLING. It is the export trade.

Mr. McCUMBER. And it has increased how much?

Mr. STERLING. From one hundred and twenty thousand and more dollars in 1898 to $27,000,000 in 1914.

Mr. McCUMBER. And what amount have the imports from the islands increased?

Mr. STERLING. The imports have been just about the same as the exports.

Mr. McCUMBER. They have increased in the same ratio?

Mr. STERLING. Increasing in about the same ratio, as I remember. If the Senator will excuse me, I think there is a difference of only a million or two dollars, and there has been only about that amount of difference for the last several years between the imports and the exports.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator if a great deal of the imports did not consist of sugar, tobacco, etc., and operated because of our taking the main duty off those products from the Philippines? In other words, we unprotected ourselves in order to obtain a very much greater supply from these foreign islands. Has not the greater portion of the increase in our exports been of beers, liquors, and other things connected with and for the use of Americans there?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I will not say as to how much the duties or the want of duty on imports has affected the Philippine trade. It undoubtedly has affected it somewhat, but yet, Mr. President, I have no complaint to make with reference to that method of dealing with the Philippines and the Philippine trade.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator another question, if the Senator will be kind enough to answer it.

Mr. STERLING. Very well.

Mr. McCUMBER. If we would put the products of Great Britain upon the free list, we could probably increase the trade from Great Britain to this country 300 or 400 per cent very quickly, could we not?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; but that is a different situation, a different condition of things. These are our own possessions, in whose advancement and development we are so much interested, and if we can encourage the development of their resources by giving them favors in the matter of import duties, I think it is the part of wisdom to do so.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to call attention to another thought, and that is Manila's importance to our far eastern trade. This is from an article by Mr. S. S. Knabenshue, former American consul general at Tientsin, China. I quote a short extract or two from that article. He says:

British commercial interests at once went to work to develop the new port of Hongkong. At that time the only settlement on the island was a village of Chinese, half pirates, half fishermen, with less than 2,000 inhabitants. In less than three-quarters of a century this has grown into the city of Victoria, with a population of 215,000—of which only some 10,000 are whites, the remainder consisting chiefly of Chinese. It was Great Britain's first commercial outpost in the Far East, and is now the most important port in that quarter of the world. It is a vast emporium of trade, handling the products of China and the Indies, which are sent by its merchants to Great Britain and Europe; and in return all kinds of western merchandise are distributed to the ports of the East. It concentrates about 30 per cent of the total foreign commerce of China, and is a most important financial and shipping center for the entire Far East.

Much else he says here is of interest and importance, but I forbear taking the time to read it.

So, Mr. President, I can not help but think that from the material, the commercial standpoint we shall find very soon that the Philippine Islands are no burden to the people of the United States. On the contrary, they will prove to be of immense benefit.

I now allude briefly to the question of capacity for self-government. I agree almost entirely with what the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] had to say in his very able speech the other day upon this particular proposition. In corroboration of what he said, and to emphasize, too, what I have heretofore said upon this subject, I call attention to the very able article entitled "Self-government in the Tropics; an analysis," by Samuel L. Parrish, which is a reprint from the Journal of the National Institute of Social Sciences. He has this to say, among other things:

In an examination of governmental conditions which from time immemorial have existed in the Tropics I can find no instance of an orderly self-government, with representative institutions, evolved from the people themselves. Nor, on the other hand, have the efforts made by England in recent times to introduce responsible self-government in her tropical dependencies given any encouragement that the issue of such experiments will prove successful. The mental, moral, and economic factors are all at variance with the conditions required for an orderly self-governing community. Of the millions of men who now occupy and of the untold millions who since recorded time have been the indigenous inhabitants of the Tropics, I think it may safely be said that no one commanding figure, judged by world standards, has ever emerged from the mass to challenge the admiration of the world as a benefactor of mankind.

Going on, he says:

The fourth and last proposition which I have undertaken to develop is: That controlling economic conditions, external and internal, no less than moral obligation will increasingly compel the United States, as potentially, if not actually, the most powerful of the civilized nations, to bear its full share in the system of dependent tropical government and supervision now recognized as an international factor of unquestioned and growing importance. Of this question it may be said that since our Civil War none more vital has confronted the American people, and in the course of its solution may well be found practically most of the future danger points which must ever beset a progressive nation in the conduct of its political relations with the other nations of the world.

In considering broadly the development of interracial relations between the dominant and inferior races during the past century one can not but be impressed by the fact that the current has been distinctly in the direction of altruism, so far at least as Great Britain and the United States are concerned, and that, too, notwithstanding the recent outbreak of savage war among the dominant races who themselves inhabit the Temperate Zone.

Slavery has been abolished throughout Christendom, and oppression, injustice, and internecine strife have more and more been giving place to orderly government throughout the tropical dependencies ruled from the Temperate Zone.

Warren Hastings would be an anachronism in the India of to-day, while venal Spanish colonial governors in Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines already seem to belong to a bygone age.

So, Mr. President, so far as there is any danger of the oppression of the Filipinos as long as they remain a part of the United States, I think it is the last thing to enter the mind of an intelligent American to-day and the last thing to merit discussion here. Further, this writer says:

Powerful as was the factor of self-protection in our late war with Spain, a sense of moral obligation alone made that war popular.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LANE. I notice the remark made by the Senator that so long as the Philippines remain in the possession of this Government they will not be liable to an attack upon their country. My opinion is just the opposite. I believe that so long as they are a part of this Nation, lying 7,000 miles from the nearest coast of this country, as they do, they are the most vulnerable and open to attack, and would be the first part of it which would be attacked by any nation at war with us in order to compel us to defend that part of our property which is the hardest for us to defend. I believe they would, by reason of their geographical position, call for an enormous increase in our Army and Navy, and that when the attack came upon us we would lose them. In addition to having to defend them from our enemies at sea, the Filipino, who resent our occupancy of their country, would attack us from the rear, and we would have to fight not only with them but with the other nation at which we were at war.

There is an element of great weakness, as I see it, in our possession of the Philippines. I do not see how the Senator, if he considers the matter carefully and from any viewpoint which a nation should take in attempting to defend itself, can view it otherwise than that the possession of the Philippine Islands is a burden upon this country.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I take quite a different view than the Senator from Oregon on that proposition. I think our retention of the Philippine Islands will not make them the subject of attack necessarily, although that seems to be always assumed. Further, there will be the necessary fortifications on the Philippine Islands to repel attack. We already have in the island of Corregidor, in Manila Bay, a second Gibraltar. If we have a naval base and coal-supply stations, it will be necessary to have them fortified as well.

Further, Mr. President, there is this consideration, which goes beyond them all, that by our surrender of the Philippines we will not be able to stem the tide of trade and of commerce with those islands. We will not be able to prevent commercial rivalry and contest between nations by our surrender of the islands, or contests as to their respective fields or spheres of influence in the islands. A situation like that would be more likely to bring complications and breed trouble than will our retention of the islands, with the acknowledgment of our rights which would necessarily flow therefrom. To be considered, too, is the maintenance there of reasonably necessary fortifications for the islands, and these are largely there already.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, every ton of munitions of war, every troop of soldiers, and every war vessel must be conveyed across the sea 7,000 miles before reaching its destination. It is therefore the most open to attack, with the fact in addition, as I stated before, that the natives themselves would revolt against us. The Philippines will be the first point of attack. Next comes the Sandwich Islands and then the Pacific coast. The retention of the Philippine Islands may in the future lead to the loss of the Pacific coast to this country.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator if he is in favor of the proposition to guarantee the independence of the Philippine Islands?

Mr. LANE. No; I am not so enthusiastic or enamored with that proposal as are some other Members of the Senate.

Mr. STERLING. That is the proposition involved in this bill.

Mr. LANE. That part of it I do not care much for, but I would gladly see this country get out of there, and go kindly with well wishes for the Filipinos, wishing them success in their independence and apologizing to them for the time that we have occupied the islands.

Mr. STERLING. While the Senator says he is not enthusiastic over the amendment which provides for a guaranty for five years, I should like to ask him if he proposes to vote for that amendment?

Mr. LANE. If it is the best I can secure toward freeing them, making them independent, and getting out of their country and away from it, allowing them to carry on their own government as they see fit and as we do ours, I will vote for it. If I can get something better, something going further, then I will vote for that.

Mr. STERLING. Yet the Senator realizes, does he not, that the guaranty may involve the very possibility of which he speaks—that of having a fleet in the Philippine Islands to maintain the guaranty?

Mr. LANE. But it is for a limited period. It is a pledge to get out as soon as some of the gentlemen think we can do so; but I would get out as soon as I could, without any guaranty and with many good wishes nicely expressed to the people of that country. However, I am going to take the best I can get.

Mr. STERLING. I say to the Senator simply this, that I go back to the original proposition that with the surrender of the Philippines now the complications that will likely arise because of disputes in regard to trade and commerce, coupled, perhaps, with unsettled conditions in the islands thereafter, would be more likely to involve us in trouble with a foreign nation having interests or seeking interests there than would the continued ownership and retention of the Philippines.

I will read one or two other excerpts from this paper:

But in considering the moral we must not forget the economic side of the question.

That is a question that I first ventured briefly to discuss.

As we note the progress of society through its various stages of evolution, there is nothing more striking than the constantly increasing importance, during the past 50 years, of the economic phase of international relations.

But the source of this superabundant energy and resultant accomplishment has been in the temperate zone, and now, as never before, it seeks outlets in the farthest corners of the earth. With the vast increase in the wealth of the dominant races, an ever-increasing demand is being made upon every heretofore outlying tropical province of the world to furnish whatever it can best produce, and receive in return therefor such products of the temperate zone as may be suited to its requirements.

And if for any reason this production and consumption are retarded by internal disorder, or conditions that science or skill can remedy, then these northern cormorants for economic results insist upon furnishing the remedy. The recent disturbance in the sisal-hemp district of Yucatan which threatened the binding-twine industry of the United States, and therefore the American farmer, would seem to have stirred the present administration to greater activity—if we except the incident of the failure to salute the flag—than anything else that has happened in Mexico for the past two years.

To bring order out of chaos for the purpose of permitting the normal economic development of a tropical island at our very doors was at least one of the avowed objects of our late War with Spain.

In the train of that war followed, in natural sequence, our occupation of the Philippine Islands, for in the redistribution of territory and spheres of influence, since the beginning of the decay of Spain's colonial empire, both in the temperate and tropic zones, the United States has been continuously, since the foundation of our Government, Spain's actual and logical heir. Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines are but corallaries of Florida and the original Spanish North American territory which came to us by forced cession after the Mexican War.

To what lengths the combination of economic necessity and moral obligation may yet compel the United States to go, no one may with safety predict, but I submit that we can not stand still. With the completion of the Isthmian Canal and the resultant increase in tropical trade, new problems arise.

So, Mr. President, although the Spanish-American War may have been the occasion of our ownership of the Philippines, we are Spain's "natural and logical heir." After Cuba and Porto Rico, the growing demands and needs of our eastern trade might easily without war lead us to the hope of dominating or acquiring the Philippines, and would have led us there eventually, to satisfy the demands of an ever-expanding trade.

Let me quote our former distinguished British Ambassador Bryce. At the beginning of his essay entitled "The Roman Empire and the British Empire in India," found in his "Studies in History and Jurisprudence," he institutes a comparison between these two great empires as conquering and ruling powers, acquiring and administering dominions outside the original dwelling place of their peoples, and impressing upon those dominions their own type of civilization; and he has this to say, which, I think, very pertinent to the broad issues here under discussion:

This comparison derives a special interest from a consideration of the position in which the world finds itself at the beginning of the twentieth century. The great civilized nations have spread themselves out so widely, and that with increasing rapidity during the last 50 years, as to have brought under their dominion or control nearly all the barbarous or semi-civilized races. Europe—that is to say, the five or six races which we call the European branch of mankind—has annexed the rest of the earth, extinguishing some races, absorbing others, ruling others as subjects, and spreading over their native customs and beliefs a layer of European ideas which will sink deeper and deeper till the old native life dies out. Thus, while the face of the earth is being changed by the application of European science, so it seems likely that within a measurable time European forms of thought and ways of life will come to prevail everywhere, except possibly in China, whose vast population may enable her to resist these solvent influences for several generations, perhaps for several centuries. In this process, whose agencies are migration, conquest, and commerce, England has led the way and has achieved the most. Russia, however, as well as France and Germany, have annexed vast areas inhabited by backward races. Even the United States has, by occupying the Hawaiian and the Philippine Islands, entered, somewhat to her own surprise, on the same path. Thus a new sort of unity is being created among mankind. This unity is seen in the bringing of every part of the globe into close relations, both commercial and political, with every other part. It is seen in the establishment of a few "world languages" as vehicles of communication between many peoples, vehicles which carry to them the treasures of literature and science which the four or five leading nations have gathered. It is seen in the diffusion of a civilization which is everywhere the same in its material aspects and is tolerably uniform even on its intellectual side, since it teaches men to think on similar lines and to apply similar methods of scientific inquiry. The process has been going on for some centuries. In our own day it advances so swiftly that we can almost foresee the time when it will be complete. It is one of the great events in the history of the world.

Mr. President, it is a world movement, then, so to speak—a civilized world movement—and we of America are within the sweep of that movement. Should we back down and out of the Philippines now we can not in the future escape the impulse or influence of this movement. In these times government itself and the establishment of governments wait on economic needs and on the demands of commerce, and the energy of this movement will not be stayed by this or by any other legislation that we may enact; it is a process not determined by written law.

So, as stated before, in answer to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], obeying this law, and having behind us the impetus already received from our 17 years of occupancy, we will be in the Philippine Islands. If they are an independent nation, we shall be there for the purpose of exercising our influence and extending the sphere of our influence in competition with the other striving commercial nations of the world, and therein will lie greater danger of friction and of conflict than if we had retained the Philippines.

Mr. President, under all the evidence we have—the evidence of economists, of scientists, of the men who have studied races and their habits in connection with the climate in which they live—we know that the Filipinos will not be fit for independent sovereign government wthin 5 years or 10 years or 20 years, perhaps a century; we are well aware of that, and yet, forgetting our sacred obligations to protect, to lead, to educate them, we propose to make them a sovereign, independent nation within the short period of four years—so short a time in the life and growth of a nation. At the same time we propose to guarantee their independence for the period of five years, in conjunction with other nations, or, if they do not agree to unite with us, then alone. In those guaranties themselves we shall have the entangling alliances against which we have been warned from the beginning of our Government to the present time.

There are alliances and alliances—those that may entangle and those that can not entangle. In the extension of our commerce, in the acquisition of the Philippine Islands themselves, we have had, as it were, the virtual alliance, the countenance, and hearty support of that other greatest colonizing nation in history or on the face of the earth—Great Britain herself. We acquired the Philippines knowing we had at least her moral support, and we were glad to have that support. There would be no rupture with England because of their relinquishment, but her opinion of us, considering all our relations and common ideals, is a matter not irrelevant to this issue. I do not believe that she would willingly enter into an agrement with us, so important and vital are her interests, to guarantee with us the independence of the Philippines for five years or for any other period. I do not believe she would enter into any such agreement. Our action would be a disappointment to her.

Why, Mr. President, think of what is involved in securing the consent of any other nation to such an agreement, giving the Filipinos independence, and for five years guaranteeing their sovereignty and independence; of what is involved in securing the consent of the statesmen and leaders of other nations who would be asked to join in this guaranty, cognizant as they will be of the facts of history. The idea as it appears to me is altogether fanciful.

Will they guarantee the independence of 8,000,000 people of different races and different dialects, with the great mass of them untutored and knowing nothing of the first principles of government? Will they guarantee the independence of those islands against the disaster and the more than possible overthrow of government that would follow the dissension and the revolution of which there would be danger should we grant them independence? No, Mr. President; it seems that we are making, as I said in the outstart—and I can not help but feel it most deeply and seriously—a grave national mistake. We are taking a step against which the achievements of the past and our success in the government of dependencies protest; we are taking a step in disregard of the material advantage we may derive from the retention of the islands and in which advantage the Filipinos themselves will share; it is a step against which the Filipino people themselves, as well as the whole American people, will in time protest; and, again, Mr. President, we are taking a step in which we ignore the sacred moral obligation to "bear the white man's burden" until the Filipinos are fit for independence and self-government. No Senator on this floor will hazard the statement that within the time provided by this bill or by these proposed guaranties the Filipino people will be fit for independent self-government.

Just a word in conclusion. I would retain the Philippines for an indefinite time without making the time of their independence the football of party politics during the years, without holding out, as we do when we follow that course, false hopes, which have the effect simply of encouraging what I may grant are the aspirations of a few brilliant politicians and agitators in the Philippine Islands, who do not reflect the feelings or the sentiments of the great body of the people. That agitation, both here and there, has been the Pandora's box from which has come many of the difficulties with which we have had to contend in the islands and some of the evils of our own party political life at home. So I would retain the Philippines without mention of the time when we would grant independence. Meanwhile I would govern them as a free, enlightened Nation can govern; I would see that they have the equal protection of the laws; I would extend as rapidly as possible to them the benefits of education, and with that education I would carry, too, experience and training in the principles of government; I would extend to them gradually that measure of self-government of which they shall be capable; I would await the time patiently until they are capable at least of autonomous government under our authority; and then I would leave it to them to say whether they would be independent or whether they would be—what they are likely to want to be—a part of imperial America.

Mr. CHILTON. I ask leave to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are absent on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I understand now that the Clarke amendment is before the Senate. To bring the matter to an issue upon the divergent thought of the Senate, I offer an amendment as a substitute for the pending amendment. I ask that the proposed substitute be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment proposed by Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas, it is proposed to insert the following:

The President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to indicate to the great powers of the world the desire of this Government to extend to the Philippine Islands and the Philippine people full and complete independence whenever it shall be warranted in the belief that such independence will be permanent and be respected by the other powers of the world. The President is further authorized and requested to secure from such other powers such agreements as will insure the independence of said islands in perpetuity, and when such agreements have been made he shall forthwith direct a convention to be held in such islands for the purpose of adopting a constitution providing for a republican form of government, and as soon as such constitution has been adopted and officers have been elected and a government inaugurated thereunder he shall, by proclamation, declare such islands and the people thereof to be a free and independent state, with all the powers of complete sovereignty.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have been laboring for some time under the impression that in conformity with the platform of the Democratic Party it was their intention to introduce and pass a bill the effect of which would be the independence of those islands from this Government. I confess that as amendments are being offered and coming from that side my faith in the intention of the other side of the Chamber to carry out that platform pledge has been somewhat shaken. I find an amendment offered here the purpose of which seems to me to be that of delay—to put the matter off at least for another administration to deal with, if not for several years. I can find nothing in the amendment or in the original bill which promises to grant independence or which establishes a rule under which such independence would naturally follow.

We are confronted here with two very distinct theories of our national duty. I should like the attention of the Senator from Arkansas at this point. The theory of a great many on this side of the Chamber is that we should not at this time even promise or suggest independence, backed by the belief of a great many on this side of the Chamber that we should continue to hold those islands for an indefinite time. I had supposed that the prevailing thought on the other side of the Chamber was that we should take definite steps toward securing Philippine independence, and that independence meant full independence from us without any strings attached to it.

Personally, I can not conceive of granting the Filipinos independence from us with a guaranty upon our part that we will protect their independence. That guaranty must necessarily carry with it the right of interference. The right of interference must to a certain degree deprive these people of the right of complete independence. Not only that, Mr. President, but the result of such a condition would be that while we release all power over the control of the islands and their internal relations, while we have no power to enforce their conduct toward the other nations of the world, we are forced to guarantee that they will not be punished for such misconduct by invasion by any other nation of the world.

I possibly stand midway between the two sides upon that question. I believe that we ought not to attempt to hold that Asiatic territory, either for our benefit or for their benefit. I believe that they do not want our protection. They are not asking for it. We are gaining nothing in affording it. There is no moral duty for us to reach over into Asia and impose our method of civilization upon them; and there being a constant responsibility, measured more than in mere millions of dollars, I think that our first duty is to get rid of those Asiatic possessions, and get rid of any Monroe doctrine that we would have to carry 7,000 miles from our shores. We have all of that doctrine we can properly attend to on this side of the earth.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to inquire of the Senator about the words "in perpetuity" in line 10. I feel very friendly toward the Senator's amendment, but I do not believe we ought to try to get anybody else to agree to something we do not agree to ourselves.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, just let me say right there that the provision in the Clarke amendment was for temporary protection, and therefore to draw the line of distinction between this amendment and those that had already been offered, whereby we were to guarantee a temporary independence, I used the words, not to guarantee anything, but to secure an agreement that the independence of the Philippines should be recognized in perpetuity. That does not mean that other nations should agree with us that forever and ever they would keep their hands off of the Philippines, but that they would enter into an agreement that the islands should be free and independent indefinitely, or at least that they would not interfere with their independence.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the Senator think that the words he has used mean more than that? The amendment says, "insure the independence of said islands in perpetuity."

Mr. McCUMBER. It says that the President should secure such an agreement as would insure their independence. Now, I think "perpetuity" goes a little further than I would insist on going.

Mr. NORRIS. It is a good while.

Mr. McCUMBER. If we just drop out the words "in perpetuity," and leave it so that it would mean indefinitely, we would obtain the same result.

Mr. NORRIS. If those words were out, I should be glad to vote for the Senator's amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should be perfectly willing to have the words stricken out.

Now, I wish to address myself again to the author of the amendment. This amendment seeks to obtain a guaranty of other nations. I think the Senator introducing it could have little hope that we would be able to secure such a guaranty after the islands had become wholly independent of our sovereignty or control; and therefore he provides that if other nations will not guarantee their independence or territorial integrity for a number of years, this Nation shall be bound to do so for that definite time.

Let me put the same question that I did yesterday. The Senator was not present at the time. Suppose we present this question to Germany, for instance, after we have released the Philippine Islands, and they are just as independent of us as any other part of the world, and we ask Germany to enter into an agreement with us that she will assist us in guaranteeing the independence of those islands. The very first question that Germany probably would ask us would be: "What consideration is there for me to enter into an agreement of that kind at this time? That agreement means war. That agreement means that I shall become your ally. That agreement means that if you get into war with Japan, and Japan seizes those islands, then, under the guaranty which I make, it becomes my duty to join with you in a quarrel against Japan for the purpose of securing the abandonment of the islands by Japan."

Suppose we put the same proposition up to Great Britain. Would not her answer naturally be the same? "It is not a matter for me now to determine. Conditions might arise in which I might wish to join you in protecting those islands; but a protectorate, a guaranty, means that that guaranty must be backed with power, and backed with power means backed with the war power. I will not enter into an agreement beforehand that if you and Japan get into a quarrel in which I have no interest, and she attacks your outlying possessions, which naturally would be the very first place at which Japan would strike, I must enter into that war with you, take up a quarrel that does not belong to me and in which I am not interested, and assist you to drive the Japanese out of the islands, in order to protect their integrity."

I believe the only conclusion is that we never could secure an agreement of that kind, and to me it would seem as though we were a bit impertinent in asking the other countries of the world, after we have lost all control over the islands, to enter into an agreement with us concerning an entirely independent nation.

While I do not think we ever would secure the guaranty, I should have no objection to voting for the amendment that is proposed by the Senator if it provided in the very beginning that before we should release our control over those islands we should secure that guaranty, because I will never believe for a moment that we can secure it after we have released our control.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas and Mr. SHAFROTH addressed the Chair.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to either one or both the Senators.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, would not the Senator's attitude be, then, that he would leave the independence of the Philippine Islands solely to the will of some foreign power? If you are going to make that a condition precedent to granting them independence, and say that these nations must join in a neutrality agreement, it would be in their power to prevent the independence of the Philippines.

I concur with the Senator in some respects in regard to the difficulty of getting foreign nations to agree to this; but I take it that according to the CLARKE amendment, while the President may not be able to obtain the consent of the nations of the world to guarantee by force of arms the sovereignty and independence of the Philippine Islands, yet he can do what has been done time and again, and was done with relation to the Hawaiian Islands, and that is that each nation would agree not to take possession of or control the islands in any manner. That would involve no obligation except their own obligation. If you would get the leading nations of the world to say, "We will not attempt to establish a suzerainty or any control whatever over the Philippines," it would have the same effect as if there had been an agreement as to sustaining the sovereignty of the islands with armed force.

Mr. McCUMBER. The point I am attempting to make, however, is that it would be impossible to secure such an agreement. There are relations between Japan and Great Britain, treaties of common interest, treaties between the other nations of the Old World, of such a character and demanding the dependence of one upon the other, that it would be impossible, in my opinion, to get other nations to agree to guarantee their independence. Now, if you put it just upon this ground—to get them to agree, upon their part, not to interfere with the independence of the Philippines—that is a different proposition. That they can do. That is a negative proposition. But here you are asking them to enter into a positive agreement which it will require all of their armed force to carry into effect, and which might require them to do the very thing that they do not wish to do at the time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But the Senator seems to attach to his amendment the idea that nothing with relation to the independence of the islands shall proceed unless that agreement is obtained. I take it that under the Clarke amendment the President would have a perfect right, if nations refused to enter into an agreement of the kind he states, to get them to say, "We will agree to withhold any effort upon our part to acquire any of the territory of those islands"; and, it seems to me, that would be right in line with the amendment. The lesser is included in the greater power, and if he can not obtain one he can obtain the other.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I do not understand that the amendment is such that the President or anyone else can hold it up indefinitely. If I am in error in that, I am willing to be corrected. My understanding is that if this agreement is not secured within a certain time, then for a definite time we will guarantee the independence of the Philippine Islands, and then they shall become independent, with our guaranty for a specific time. That is my understanding of the amendment—not that the President has power, nor any succession of Presidents, to continue their dependence just as long as his judgment should dictate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; I do not understand that that exists under the Clarke amendment; but I think the Senator agrees that if the nations of the world would unanimously guarantee the independence of the islands it would unquestionably be a good thing.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Now, if it can not be done, the President evidently has the power to do the next best thing, and that is to have each one agree that they will not trespass upon the territory of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, but there is no such proposition in the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. If that proposition were in it—that if the President can not secure the one, he at least might secure their agreement to refrain from interference upon their part, as a condition precedent to the granting of independence—I certainly should support it. But I want to say to the Senator that there is a line of difference between our ideas of what should be done with the Philippine Islands. While I take the ground that we are under no moral obligation to continue to educate the Filipino people indefinitely; that we are under no moral obligation to stand guardian over an Asiatic people seven or eight thousand miles away from our nearest border, I do concede that, having taken possession of them, having made them our foster child for a period of 16 or 17 years, our relation toward them has been changed in some respects, and that changed relation imposes a duty upon our part. My conviction is that if we now release our control over them, we should see to it that no other great nation shall proceed to take possession of them. I think we owe it to them and to ourselves, if we grant them independence, that we shall know beforehand that that independence is going to be respected by the great nations of the world.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The trouble with the position of the Senator is that he wants that as a condition precedent. I think the most important thing is the independence of the Philippines. If they are willing to take the independence without this guaranty—and it seems that they are, as they say that no nation that ever obtained independence ever asked for a protectorate—we ought not to hold back and make it a condition that "it is necessary to obtain an international agreement before we will give them independence." We ought not to make such a condition.

I do not consider that the danger of outside interference is of such great moment. I do not believe that there is going to be any such interference. Many of the nations of the world are small, and yet have maintained their independence for many years. I believe that there is more danger to the Philippine people of a change of policy of some kind upon our part, as in the exercise of an iron hand upon them, and that they would have more ground for fearing that than they would of any other nation attempting to take control of them.

For that reason I put first, as the most important thing in this bill, the independence of the islands; and second, such guaranties of nations as we are able to get to maintain their independence.

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President; the most important thing is not the temporary independence of the islands. The most important thing is the permanent independence of the islands. The most important thing to the islanders themselves is not that they shall be granted a temporary independence that may last two or three or five years, and which they may lose the moment that any of the countries get into a conflict over there, and either one or the other may consider that it is for its interest that it should seize and hold the islands. I think we owe them a further duty than merely saying, "Now, get out and take care of yourselves." The reason why I insist upon the condition precedent is that I feel positive we will not get any condition subsequent; certainly not a condition that amounts to a guaranty of their independence.

I am not frightened by the specter that is held up by my good neighbor here from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] that the moment we cease our control over those islands there will be scenes of riot, insurrection, and bloodshed. I believe the evidence establishes that the great majority of those people are rather docile. I am more inclined to think that the great majority will be imposed upon, and that the government will be controlled by a very few than there will be danger of insurrection after insurrection. Probably not more than one out of fifty of the inhabitants of those islands is fitted for self-government, and the probabilities are that that one out of fifty in each instance will do the governing. They may govern fairly well; but what I want to secure, before I dare let go of those islands, is the assurance that no other nation will immediately seize them. We would not want to send our child out from us where we knew or felt that there was danger of his being destroyed by any force; nor do I feel that we ought to send the Philippine Islands out of our control without some understanding on the part of the other nations of the world that if we are generous enough to grant them their independence other nations shall at least be generous enough to leave them alone.

I am fearful that they are not all governed by the same ideals that I hope govern this country. I never have known of an instance in history where any great nation, as powerful as ours, has taken possession, through conquest or otherwise, of another smaller country and has withdrawn of its own accord; has given the people of the subject nation education and shown it the pathway of popular government—"We will now release you from our control and send you on your way with our blessing." I am suspicious that the world is not educated up to that idea as yet, and that you can not trust it implicitly. Because of my suspicion, I do hope that before we adopt a policy that says that the Philippine Islands shall no longer be subject to this country we shall feel reasonably sure that they shall not be subject to any other country in the world.

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] has discussed the value of the Philippine Islands to us from a financial standpoint. I said the other day, and I think I could corroborate the statement by figures if I desired to take the time, that where we have received $1 of benefit we have paid more than $100 of expense. Wherever we have increased the trade of the Filipino people with the United States we have done so at the expense of the people of the United States in giving them free markets for their sugar and tobacco, and so forth, that compete with our own home industries. From a commercial standpoint we have benefited them, without any possible question, and if they have received any benefit from us we have taxed ourselves to pay for that benefit ten times over.

But we can not measure our responsibilities in mere dollars and cents. There is another obligation that we have imposed upon us. We are now to enter upon a new phase of American life—the creation of a mighty Army and Navy. We are now to compete with Great Britain and Germany and Japan in the building of dreadnaughts. I admit that so long as we hold the Philippine Islands we shall have to have more dreadnaughts than either Germany or Japan. We shall have to be able to defend the islands. As has been suggested by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], those islands are the one great vulnerable point in our American defenses, and we must meet that vulnerability.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. STERLING. I merely wish to ask the Senator if that consideration has governed us up to this day in the matter of building dreadnaughts? Can the Senator say that we have increased our Navy or built dreadnaughts for the purpose of defending the Philippine Islands?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes, Mr. President; it has governed us. I remember very well when we were first asked to increase our yearly appropriation for two battleships a year to four. It was based entirely upon the assumption that there was danger from the Asiatic side, not from the European side, at that time; and it meant that we must have an ever-increasing navy to be able to meet the conditions on that side of the ocean. I will say frankly to-day that if I vote for added dreadnaughts, and so forth, I shall be governed more by the necessity of defending the Philippine Islands than by any other single factor.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota a further question—whether, irrespective of the Philippine Islands, he thinks our Navy is too large?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; Mr. President, I answer the Senator frankly. We may need a good, strong Navy. I do not think we need as great a Navy as Great Britain, if that is included in your question, for the reason that Great Britain has vulnerable points even beyond that which we have, and so close to us where we can strike her so quickly and so effectively that there is no danger of war with that country, unless we were the one to force the war ourselves.

Mr. STERLING. I quite agree with the Senator from North Dakota, that we do not need nor should it be our ambition to have as great a Navy as Great Britain; but my question simply related to whether or not, irrespective of our ownership or retention of the Philippines, our Navy as it exists is too large.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I am not saying that our Navy as it exists is too large. As the other nations grow in naval power and as we have considerable commerce with the outside world, we shall have to keep somewhat apace with their growth, but it does not mean, as in this instance, that we shall not only keep at a general pace but keep ourselves so much ahead that we are able to cross the ocean 7,000 miles and defend our outlying possessions. It needs a very much larger Navy, and a very much larger standing Army to be transported to this weakest point than it would require if we were not under obligation to protect them.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, we are then coming back to my original proposition exactly, that we have no greater Navy now than we reasonably need. The Senator has said that we were induced to build a Navy because of the Philippines, and that that was the argument used at the time of the appropriation for the increase of the Navy.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no; the Senator misunderstands me. That certainly was not my intended statement.

Mr. STERLING. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I say the growth has been influenced more or less by the fact that we have had the Philippines, and that has been used heretofore as an argument to double the number yearly of our dreadnaught type of battleships, because of the danger from the Asiatic side.

Mr. STERLING. Then, Mr. President, all I have to say is that if our Navy is no greater than we need, the influence of the Philippines in causing the building of a greater Navy was a good and wholesome influence.

Mr. McCUMBER. The influence did not operate to build the extra two, however. The influence was not sufficiently strong. We voted only our two battleships yearly, just the same as we had done the year previous; but the pressure was extraordinarily strong that we should proceed immediately to provide for four battleships a year, and to-day there are administration orators traveling over the country proclaiming the necessity of not only doubling but trebling or many-times-over increasing our armament and battleships.

The question comes right back to us, why? What particular danger looms up in the horizon to-day which demands that we should so greatly increase our naval and military power? We know that the great nations of Europe must necessarily be nearly exhausted before they get through with this war. We know that they will not be in a condition to immediately enter into an aggressive war against us. We know that if there were dangers pending that, with our present preparedness, we could further prepare more rapidly than they could, with their depleted war chests and their destroyed resources. We could fit ourselves ready for war more quickly than any of these Governments could fit themselves to make war against us. Then why this wonderful haste toward suddenly building up a mighty war fleet and increasing our standing army without giving us the slightest idea as to where the danger is to come from?

Because of our attitude toward people of a certain color, who are proud and strong and believe that they ought not to be legislated against, I can naturally see that there is constant danger of friction and that we can never tell when that danger may break out into open hostility, and we must be prepared to meet it. But it is one thing to be prepared to meet and overcome a hostile fleet seven or eight thousand miles from our own shores and quite another to merely defend our own coasts or our necessary commerce. With submarines and torpedo boats and mines we can defend our own shores. We would not require half as much of a navy in the one instance as in the other.

That, Mr. President, is one of the principal reasons why I would like to get rid of the Philippine Islands and withdraw our Monroe doctrine from Asiatic waters. We will have enough to do to take care of our Monroe doctrine right here at home without attempting to enforce it all over the world. The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas forces our Monroe doctrine into Asia.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I may agree with the Senator from North Dakota in regard to objections to the administration defense program—I am not quite ready to say what my position will be in that regard—but I think he must concede that in his general view of the European war now that is the great stimulus for this immense defense program, and not the Philippine Islands.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am very thankful to the Senator that he has given me the reason. In other words, he says we are nervous of war; that war is going on around us and it makes us nervous.

Now, the time to be sane is when everyone else is crazy. The time for us to keep our mental balance is when all the rest are at war attempting to destroy each other.

I am not discussing at present the general matter of an increased Army and Navy. I am willing to join in doing what is necessary and proper for national defense or preparedness, but I should like to have some good reasons stated why it is necessary to double and treble our Army and our Navy unless we are all looking toward that one weak spot away off in the Pacific—and the sooner we get rid of that, in my opinion, the better for this country.

Mr. President, in closing this short debate I assume that Senators on the other side are already agreed as to what they are going to do in the matter of amendments. I am not so fearful now of your Filipino bill becoming an effective law that will really bring on the independence of the Filipinos. You put the matter off for several years. You establish no definite policy, except a policy to get something that I am certain you will never succeed in getting, a guaranty. Another Congress two or three Congresses ahead will undoubtedly deal with that question. But feeling as I do that we ought to get out of Asia, feeling as I do that we owe a duty to the Philippine Islands because we have held them and that duty is to assure the independence which we may grant to them, I have drafted this simple amendment. If we can not secure from these Governments an agreement that they will respect the independence of the islands toward which we show this kindly interest and this great national spirit of justice, if they will not agree to allow them to remain independent, then I say frankly I want to hold them until they do agree to do so.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will permit me a question before he takes his seat; I refer to the first part of the Senator's amendment which authorizes the President of the United States "to indicate to the great powers of the world the desire of this Government to extend to the Philippine Islands and the Philippine people full and complete independence whenever it shall be warranted in the belief that such independence will be permanent and be respected by the other powers of the world." I suppose the meaning is whenever the Government of the United States shall be warranted in the belief.

Mr. McCUMBER. Surely; the pronoun "it" refers to the Government.

Mr. STERLING. I would like to have the Senator explain in what way we would have an expression of that belief on the part of the Government. It would be by act of Congress?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; by entering into diplomatic relations with each of the great Governments that would be at all liable to interfere with the independence of those islands, and an agreement or a treaty, because it would be in effect a treaty, that they would refrain from interfering with the independence of the islands.

Mr. STERLING. Yes; but before there is any diplomatic correspondence with other powers, Mr. President, the amendment implies that the Government of the United States shall be first warranted in the belief that such independence will be permanent and be respected by the other powers of the world.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think the Senator reads it correctly—

> The President of the United States is hereby authorized and requested to indicate to the great powers of the world the desire of this Government to extend to the Philippine Islands and the Filipino people full and complete independence whenever it shall be warranted in the belief that such independence will be permanent—

And so forth.

That is, that the Government will indicate the desire of this Government to extend to the Philippine people independence when this Government is assured that the independence will be permanent. There can be but one meaning to that.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, just one further question. Of course the Senator realizes to what extent the question of independence in the Philippine Islands has been made the subject of party politics from the time of our acquisition of the islands. Does not the Senator think that even with his amendment it would still be made a partisan matter?

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President; I hope that that would not be the case. I am dealing with the matter certainly from a nonpartisan standpoint, and I hope Senators on the other side will do exactly the same thing, and will show their good faith in the intent to give to these people independence. Giving them independence from us is not where we want to stop. We want to know that they are going to be independent after they have left our control.

Mr. President, I will strike out of my amendment the words "in perpetuity," in line 10. I do not think they are necessary.

Mr. CLAPP. Before the Senator takes his seat will he pardon an interruption?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I certainly do not want to be captious about the amendment; I am in sympathy with a good deal that the Senator has said; but it does seem to me that this leaves the matter in a very vague and indefinite way. After first providing that the President is "authorized and requested to indicate to the great powers of the world the desire of this Government to extend to the Philippine Islands and the Filipino people full and complete independence whenever it shall be warranted in the belief that such independence will be permanent and be respected by the other powers of the world"——

Mr. McCUMBER. That is, it is our desire to do so only when we are assured that it will be respected. That is the meaning of the phrase.

Mr. CLAPP. Now:

> And when such agreements have been made.

There are no designated governments that we are to deal with. The administration which is in power might feel that an agreement with one or two nations would do, while Congress might feel that the nations which might most likely be inclined to make trouble thereafter were not included. There would then the issue arise as to whether or not the great powers of the world had joined in this agreement.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, we have dealt so long with the phrase "the great powers of the world" that I think we have all come to recognize what is meant by it. It is impossible to designate every nation in the world or to designate just where the line might be drawn. I should think it a little mischievous to designate particular nations. I would rather leave it to the President to act when he thinks that we have a sufficient number to justify it. Remember the matter will always be before Congress until it is completed. I certainly would want Great Britain, Germany, France, Austria, Russia, Italy, Japan, and Spain to be included. The President might think it was not necessary to include Italy or not necessary to include Spain, possibly not, but I think in all probability he would include those which we recognize as the principal powers of Europe and Asia.

Mr. CLAPP. My objection to it is that it really does not settle anything. It does seem to me that we ought to do one of two things—either quit talking about the independence of the Philippine Islands or take specific steps that more or less automatically would lead to our acknowledgment of their independence.

I do not want to be captious every time a Senator offers an amendment here; I realize that it is much easier to find fault with amendments than it is to draw them; but it does seem to me that at this time we ought to do one of two things—either quit talking about it or take steps to acknowledge their independence.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator a question, since he has asked me one. Even though the Senator may believe in the independence of the Philippine Islands, does he believe that we ought to grant them independence without any understanding with any power on the face of the earth that that independence shall be recognized or respected? Would he be willing to turn them loose without any understanding with any other power in the world?

Mr. CLAPP. That is just what I am in favor of, so much so that I find it difficult, even as a step toward their independence, to support any of these amendments. I am opposed to any string being tied to it, and I certainly am opposed to any entangling engagements with other nations or any entangling engagements between the Filipinos when they become a nation and this Nation. If on the day when our fleet sailed into the harbor of Manila there was no obligation resting on us to wrest the Filipinos from foreign dominion, there certainly is no obligation resting upon us to-day to guarantee their independence, unless in the 17 years we have rendered them less capable, perhaps, to take care of themselves than they were before.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there is no obligation on my part to take a poor child out of the street and take him into my family for 17 years, but if I do so I feel that I have a little greater obligation at the end of those 17 years to look after the interest of that child. That is the difference between the Senator and myself.

Mr. CLAPP. When I surrender that child he may be less able and less capable to meet whatever surroundings there might be in front of him. If I had taken the child and led him by the hand for 17 years and guided him and protected him and guarded him, I am under no obligation to continue that burden unless my relations to that child had rendered the child less capable than he was when I first took him under my tutelage and guardianship.

Mr. McCUMBER. Possibly, Mr. President, there would be no real obligation except the obligation of your own heart and conscience. Interest grows toward your ward, an interest which demands of you that you should do something more for that child than you would if he had never been under your control.

Mr. CLAPP. Undoubtedly in the 17 years with that kind of a relationship there would grow up in me an affection for that boy, but I am speaking now of one race dealing with an alien race, where the sentiment of affection cuts no figure and can not cut any figure. We took those islands. We were under no obligation that morning to relieve them from the dominion of Spain. After 17 years, teaching them the lesson of liberty, teaching them the intelligence that comes from common schools, if to-day we are under an obligation to do something that we were not before we sailed there in 1898 it is because the relation which has existed has rendered them less capable and less competent to go on with their own affairs.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I feel that there is more of an obligation than there was upon us when we first took the Philippine Islands, but that is a difference between the Senator and myself.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. In just one moment I will yield. The Senator says this amendment does not get anywhere. I do not want it to get anywhere until I know that these people are going to have independence, until we get an understanding. I believe that all the nations of the world would be glad to have us release the Philippine Islands and not project ourselves into Asiatic matters, unless possibly it would be Great Britain alone. I feel that there would be no difficulty while they are in our possession for us to get an arrangement, because there is a consideration. While they are ours, the consideration is that we will let go of them, and I believe all the great Governments would be highly pleased to have us do so. But beyond that, if we once let go of them, then I can not see any consideration that we can offer to other nations for entering into a guaranty obligation.

Mr. CLAPP. I quite agree that there is nothing in the guaranty obligation, and if I vote for that amendment it will be solely on the ground that it is the only apparent avenue toward a conclusion of some sort in this matter. But my objection to this is that after this experiment of getting the agreement with those nations has been tried out, one group will say to this country we have now placed this matter where independence is permanently guaranteed and another group will say we have not got this nation or that nation into the agreement, and we still leave it a matter to be beaten back and forth between two political parties.

Mr. McCUMBER. There may be some dangers, Mr. President, from certain directions where there would be no danger from other directions. I think we could trust the President and Congress to determine which were the dangerous directions and to meet them.

Obtaining this agreement will be the first step. Then all we have to do is to call a convention and agree upon a republican form of government in the Philippine Islands, allow them to elect their officers, and then a proclamation by the President frees them forever from our control, under the amendment which I offer.

Mr. CLAPP. That part is easy. When the various contending factions and interests in this country, if they ever should, under this amendment, agree that a sufficient guaranty has been obtained, the balance of it is automatic. That is a part of the amendment that I am in sympathy with, and to that extent I prefer it to the other amendment. But that does not relieve us of the situation that at any time there will still be a difference of opinion. There are those who believe that the suggestion of the Philippine Islands being attacked by some foreign nation is a dream. The only reality it has in history is the fact that we took them when we got into the war with Spain.

Mr. McCUMBER. If we had not been in the war with Spain, we never would have taken them.

Mr. CLAPP. We never would have touched them.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is absolutely correct. I yield now to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to direct the Senator's attention to line 6 of his amendment. I suggest to him that there might be, it seems to me, a possible misunderstanding there in the way it reads. If the Government of the United States "shall be warranted in the belief that such independence will be permanent and be respected by the other powers," and so forth. It seems to me that the words "permanent" and "be" ought to be stricken out, so that it will read that the President shall indicate to those powers that this Government desires "to extend to the Philippine Islands and the Philippine people full and complete independence whenever it shall be warranted in the belief that such independence will be respected by the other powers of the world."

If it is left just as it is it will be for this Government first to determine whether it is of the belief that the independence will be permanent, and after it has determined that, then, whether such independence will be respected by the other powers of the world.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator does not get the right construction of the sentence. The sentence means that we indicate our desire to grant independence on the condition that we believe such independence will be permanent.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, when is that going to be? Who is going to decide that?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is simply declaring our sentiment that we do not wish to indicate that we would give them independence independent of the fact that it shall be recognized by others. We want that first.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, does not the Senator think it will take some further legislation? Suppose the President would say, "I am of the opinion myself, and I am representing the Government of the United States, that independence would not be permanent?"

Mr. McCUMBER. No; the President simply indicates not his desire, but that it is the desire of this Government to grant independence to those islands upon assurances that such independence will be permanent. It does not desire to grant independence unless it is assured.

Mr. NORRIS. By the other governments?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I thought the Senator wanted it to mean, and that is what I should like to have it mean, but it seems to me that as he has it drawn it does not quite mean that. The President could really say, "The Government of the United States has not yet determined the first feature." It says, "The President of the United States is authorized and requested to indicate to the great powers of the world the desire of this Government to extend to the Philippine Islands and the Philippine people full and complete independence whenever it shall be warranted in the belief that such independence will be permanent and be respected by the other powers of the world."

Now, somebody must determine for this Government. We do not determine it by this act, if we leave it that way. Somebody must determine for the Government whether we believe it is going to be permanent, and after we have determined that then we want an additional assurance that it will be respected by the other powers.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, that is not the idea I seek to convey at all. That section relates only to the expression of the desire of this Government.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I understand.

Mr. McCUMBER. It has nothing whatever to do with the act of the President, except that the President shall indicate that it is not the desire of this Government—putting it in the negative way—to give independence to the Philippine people unless it feels at the time that such independence will be respected and be permanent.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator and myself are in perfect accord as to what we want to do, but it does seem to me that he has not expressed that idea, and that it would be completely expressed by striking out the words "permanent and be." Then it would read:

The President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to indicate to the great powers of the world the desire of this Government to extend to the Philippine Islands and the Philippine people full and complete independence whenever it shall be warranted in the belief that such independence will be respected by the other powers of the world.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, Mr. President, it would mean exactly the same thing, in my opinion; but, as the Senator thinks that it will not, I will amend it by striking out the words "permanent and be" in line 6 and will offer the amendment in that form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then, the question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota as modified to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, is that amendment offered as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; that is the purpose.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. While I am on my feet, Mr. President, I wish to say that the Senator from North Dakota is not entirely accurate in his statement or assumption that the Senators on this side of the Chamber have agreed upon any particular amendment to this bill. The bill has been discussed for the most part on the other side of the Chamber. I think it is growing rather late to-day, but to-morrow it will probably receive some discussion on this side of the Chamber, especially by the Senator who is the author of the amendment.

I want to say for myself that the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Arkansas is not satisfactory and that I shall take occasion to point out what I consider objections to it, or to parts of it; but I did not like to have the statement of the Senator from North Dakota pass without comment and leave the assumption that there has been any agreement upon the amendment.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, on to-morrow at 2 o'clock I shall ask the Senate to hear me briefly in support of the amendments I have from time to time offered. I think I can join the Senator from Nebraska in the statement that the amendment in its present form is not so satisfactory to me as it might be. I have been induced to modify it from time to time until I am now in a frame of mind to say that it barely satisfies me. I would be glad to see more prompt, effective, and definite action taken in connection with this subject, but legislation is a matter of compromise; it involves the process of harmonizing conflicting views, and it frequently turns out that a legislator is compelled to accept very much less than he would demand if he had the power to supply his own wishes. So I will address the Senate briefly on to-morrow, if I have the opportunity, at 2 o'clock.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I could not hear the suggestion made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. Whenever the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] is complete, I have an amendment which I propose to offer as a substitute for it, after the other amendments already proposed are voted upon. I could not hear what the Senator from Nebraska suggested with respect to the procedure. Will he restate it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I made no suggestion as to the procedure. I understand that the vote will first come upon the substitute offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], and, so far as I am concerned, I am ready to take that vote now. After that has been acted upon it will then be for the Senate to decide what further action to take. The Senator from Arkansas desires not to speak to-day. I had hoped that he would address the Senate to-day, and that the amendment might come to a vote to-day; but to-morrow I shall urge that we reach a final vote upon the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas and all substitutes or amendments to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understood the Senator from Arkansas to suggest that he desired to discuss his amendment to-morrow at 2 o'clock; but do I understand from the Senator from Nebraska that the present amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas is to be withdrawn and another offered in its stead?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. No, sir; the Senator did not understand the Senator from Nebraska to say that, because there is nothing less likely to occur than that. It may be amended, and probably needs amendment, but I think I can say with certainty that it will not be withdrawn.

Mr. CUMMINS. I thought that a different amendment had been agreed upon on the other side.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No, Mr. President. I was correcting a statement made by the Senator from North Dakota to the effect that he assumed that this side had agreed upon some particular amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I beg pardon. I entirely misunderstood the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am glad if I have been misinformed.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, we have not adhered very closely to the rules in the consideration of these various amendments. As a matter of fact, there are three so-called Clarke amendments pending; that is to say, there are three that have been introduced. The Senator from Iowa need not defer until to-morrow any remarks that it is his purpose to submit, for his amendment has been offered; it will be reached in regular order, and there is no reason why he should not proceed with his remarks this afternoon if he sees proper to do so.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am quite ready to go on at any moment when it is in order to do so. I desire, as soon as the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota is disposed of, to offer an amendment, and when I have offered it I intend to debate it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It will be only an amendment in the second degree if the Senator should offer his amendment now. That is in order, and he may debate that at this time.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the ordinary rule of the Senate is that an amendment should be perfected before any other amendment is offered as a substitute; and as the Senator wishes to defer his discussion and, possibly, to perfect his own amendment, I would rather not press mine for a vote this afternoon, but wait until I know just exactly what the Senator is going to propose. Possibly his amendment might be such that I would not want to offer mine as an amendment to it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I have no purpose at this time of offering any further modifications of the amendment; but I was attempting to make way for the Senator from Iowa to proceed with his remarks this afternoon. The amendment offered by myself is the main question. The Senator from North Dakota has offered a substitute. The Senator from Iowa may offer his amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota, and proceed at this time, if he so elects.

Mr. CUMMINS. I prefer, if it will not inconvenience anybody, to offer mine as a substitute for the amendment presented by the Senator from Arkansas, after the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota shall have been disposed of in some way.

Mr. McCUMBER. And, Mr. President, I would prefer to defer action on my amendment until the Senator from Arkansas, who has not spoken upon his amendment at all, has had an opportunity to do so. He might change my opinion altogether.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I think that is an entirely reasonable request, and I am sure the Senate will not insist upon a course in contravention of it.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if there is nothing more now to be said, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 27, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 26, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

"O Thou Eternal One, whose presence bright all space doth occupy," mindful of our dependence upon Thee for all that we are and all that we can hope to be, we most fervently pray that Thou wilt continue to uphold, sustain, and guide us as individuals and as a people; deliver us from egotism and bigotry, that with minds and hearts open to conviction we may march on to larger life, to greater victories, under the leadership of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FRANCES M. HAMMOND—LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. DALE of New York, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Frances M. Hammond, House bill 21013, Sixty-third Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on Labor.

CHILD LABOR.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, on last Wednesday the bill (H. R. 8234) to prevent interstate commerce in the products of child labor, and for other purposes, was called, but by unanimous consent consideration of that bill was deferred until to-day.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, would it not be well to have some agreement as to the time for general debate?

Mr. LEWIS. Under the amended rule, the general debate is limited to two hours.

Mr. MANN. Unless the House by unanimous consent extends the time.

Mr. LEWIS. In the absence of any agreement, I presume that an hour will be given to each side, and I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole——

The SPEAKER. That motion is not necessary. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 8234, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 8234, to prevent interstate commerce in the products of child labor, and for other purposes. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEWIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that half of the two hours of general debate be put under the control of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WATSON].

Mr. MANN. It does not require unanimous consent. The committee can not give more time. The gentleman will have an hour.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maryland made a request for unanimous consent, which, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], seems to have been waived. Reserving the right to object for a moment, I want to ask the gentleman from Maryland whether the two hours' general debate is to be confined to the bill?

Mr. MANN. The rule requires that.

Mr. LEWIS. That is my understanding.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That there shall be no outside discussion, then, during the two hours?

The CHAIRMAN. The rule provides that the discussion shall be confined to the bill. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, two questions are presented by the report of the committee on this bill. The first is a question of policy, the second is a question of constitutional power.

I submit that the question of policy has been settled by the legislative decisions of nearly all the States. According to those decisions it is necessary that limitations be placed upon the contractual powers of the parent and the employer with reference to the age when the minor may be employed. Another branch of the question of policy is this: Should those restrictions be imposed by 48 governing authorities, bound in the nature of things to differ, and to introduce uncertainty and complexity in the operations of the rule, or where there is practical unanimity as to the necessity and wisdom of the rule, should it be prescribed by a single authority, insuring uniformity in application and effect? So far as I am concerned, sir, I consider definite rules of limitation upon the ages when children may be employed as of an importance equal to that which actuated the Congress in passing a uniform bankruptcy law. I see no more objection on institutional or moral grounds to applying a uniform rule to the subject of labor of children than I see to applying it to the subject of the rules that shall govern insolvent debtors and their creditors. No appeal on the ground of sectionalism, no attack on the ground that some particular State is delinquent, makes any appeal to me. I plant myself firmly on the ground that the child's life, the importance of a good rule and a uniform rule with regard to the employment of children, are of a dignity that ranks as high as the business considerations which have inspired us to pass a uniform bankruptcy law.

That leaves open, then, only, so far as I am concerned, the question of constitutional power. With regard to that, sir, I must say that, as a lawyer, I have been surprised by the discussions that have taken place before this committee, discussions of a character upon constitutional law that rank as high as any discussions I have ever heard in my experience of 20 years as a lawyer before the courts of my State, to find that clearly and lucidly the power to deal with this subject, the power to deal with any subject relating to the interstate-commerce laws, is one very much more plenary, very much wider in character, than I had ever supposed.

The result of those discussions, sustained by the courts stated in the form of a conclusion, is this: The power to regulate interstate commerce and foreign commerce is without any implied limitations whatever. The only limitations that exist upon the exercise of that power must be limitations expressed in the Constitution itself. Now, it can not be disputed that this bill constitutes a regulation of interstate commerce, because it provides that articles may not be shipped in interstate commerce under certain circumstances. It is therefore a regulation of interstate commerce because it qualifies the exercise of the privilege of participating in interstate commerce. The question arises as to the consideration which moves the Congress to impose that regulation, the regulation itself being beyond question as a fact. What considerations may Congress have in mind in undertaking regulations of interstate commerce? The answer to that gentlemen will find is this: That Congress may move on any consideration, that Congress may move for the accomplishment of any object that is not prohibited by other sections of the Federal Constitution.

The interstate power reposed in Congress is the historical successor of the power that the colonies had as independent nations or sovereignties to do what they pleased in relation to foreign or intercolonial commerce; to do anything they pleased, with reason or without reason, in determining what commerce should move from State to State. The Federal Government in this respect succeeded to their power, to their full and complete and unlimited power. It was shifted from the colonies to the Federal Government, and the only restraint upon the exercise of that power by the Federal Government is what is known as the fifth amendment, corresponding in its effect upon the Federal legislative power to the fourteenth amendment on the State power, namely, that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

Here are three great substantive subjects of legislation—life, liberty, property. This bill does not involve life, it does not involve the right to property, but it does involve the question of contractual liberty as interpreted by the decisions of our court; liberty, in the sense of the power of the employer to make contracts with the parents of children for their employment below certain minima described in the bill.

Now, let us ask directly, what contractual rights the employer has that are beyond the reach of the State or Federal legislation in the employment of children? The question answers itself in the experience of every layman and every lawyer on this floor. No court has ever held that an employer has a right to make such contracts a right beyond the regulative power of the legislative functions of the government.

The restrictions in this bill are 14 years, 16 years, and then again some about employment during the midnight hours. I challenge anyone here to mention a statute containing any restriction of that character that has ever been held violative of "liberty" as State legislation. These clauses, of course, mean the same in the fifth amendment and the fourteenth amendment. One has its application to State legislative functions and the other its application to the Federal. Their meaning is identical in both cases. If the employer has no invulnerable right to make contracts, if there is no invulnerable liberty in that respect, in relation to employment under State legislation, then in the nature of things he can not have it under the same clause, applied to the same subject by Federal legislative power.

We are not without direct light on this subject from the great tribunal that sits between the two branches of this Congress. In the lottery case, identical with this in principle and character, the Supreme Court held that Congress could use a regulation of interstate commerce, namely, a prohibition of the movement of certain commodities, in order to accomplish a moral object within the State of Louisiana. That moral object was the prevention of the evil of gambling through the lottery enterprises then conducted. If it can use a regulation of interstate commerce to stop lotteries, surely it can not be denied the power to use the same regulation with the object of stopping the employment of children and women under certain deleterious and forbidden circumstances.

They say that the child is not hurt by its employment up to 14. They might refer to my own personal experience, for I went into the mines of Pennsylvania when I was 9 years of age. But I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that every child taken away from the opportunities of education, the opportunities provided at great expense for them by our institutions, before he arrives at the age of 14 years, is a child who is seriously wronged and injured. [Applause.]

I do not care to hear from the doctors on this subject. It is enough to know that as a representative of conditions sought to be remedied by this bill that I was deprived of the priceless privilege of an education in my youth and that other children ought not to be deprived of it in our time, when the art of the inventor, when the achievements of the great masters of industry, and the progress of this world have made it easy for men without such children to win sufficient bread and raiment for the support of their families. What is our civilization worth if we still have to employ such children of this country in manufacturing enterprises?

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I have given the provisions of this bill careful consideration, and, in my judgment, they merit the most serious consideration by this Congress. It brings before us, in boldest form, the constitutional question of State rights, in all its seriousness and importance; and along with it an equally serious question of public policy. I desire to discuss the bill from these two angles.

The first section of the bill prohibits the shipment in interstate commerce, by any producer, manufacturer, or dealer, of the product of any mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment in the United States which has been produced, in whole or in part, by the labor of persons under the age of 14 years, or by the labor of persons between the ages of 14 years and 16 years, who work more than eight hours in any one day or more than six days in any one week, or after the hour of 7 o'clock in the evening, or before the hour of 7 o'clock in the morning.

The first question that would suggest itself to the average mind upon a full reading of this bill is why the peculiar wording of the bill, "prohibiting shipment in interstate commerce."

I hope to show later in my argument that this phraseology furnishes only a flimsy pretext under which such legislation could bear any semblance to a valid law.

While this bill by its title pretends to deal with interstate commerce, a careful reading will disclose that this is but a subterfuge through which stealthily to rob the several States of their reserved constitutional right to regulate their purely internal affairs. It deals with the age and hours of labor of persons and not with rules and regulations for interstate commerce. This impression of the measure is entirely borne out by a reading of the report from the Committee on Labor, which recommends its passage.

In the outset of their report, in stating the design of the bill, they say:

> It attacks the national evil of child labor.

And, again, I read in the report:

> As it will be observed, the minimum penalties fixed under the act are comparatively small as contrasted with the character of the injury done to the State by the lawbreaker in fostering the national evil which it is the aim of this bill to abolish.

Under the second subdivision of the report, entitled "Necessity for Federal relief," not a word is said about any needed or wholesome regulation of the agencies of commerce, but five and one-half pages are consumed in dealing with the necessity for such police regulations which by law belong to the States and a complaint that the States have not done so efficiently.

We read in Upshur on the Federal Government, 98 and post, the following:

> Congress has no right to employ for one purpose means ostensibly provided for another. To do so would be a positive fraud and a manifest usurpation; for if the purpose be lawful, it may be accomplished by its own appropriate means, and if it is unlawful it should not be accomplished at all. Without this check it is obvious that Congress may by indirection accomplish almost any forbidden object.

It is difficult to follow the line of reasoning adopted by the committee which brings them to the conclusion that Federal relief only is competent to cure it, for on page 12 of their report they show that 44 States have already legislated upon this subject.

If 44 States of this Union have already undertaken the task of dealing with this problem, including all the great manufacturing States, we may well ask ourselves the question why should the Congress of the United States undertake it, and especially since it involves setting a dangerous precedent by violating the Constitution.

That the laws in the several States differ in their provisions is but the greater reason why they should be let alone. Each State is attempting to meet the requirements peculiar to the condition and needs of its own people.

Is it not fair to presume that the legislatures of the several States, elected by the voters of those States and directly responsible to them, are more competent to judge of the needs of that State than is Congress, far removed from the people to be affected, and with only a few Members who have any first-hand information of their peculiar needs?

Is it possible that those who advocate this measure think that they have "received the coal from off the altar" of ultimate truth? Do they ascribe to themselves that wisdom which, they hold, has been denied to the State legislatures, by which they are justified in fixing this absolute rule for the government of the citizens of all the States?

It is absolutely certain, as seen from the instrument itself, as well as from the writings of that day, that the great minds who framed our Constitution never accredited us as Congressmen with such wisdom.

The sovereign States only delegated to Congress certain powers, and among these is the right to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. All other powers not delegated were reserved to the States.

There was a deep-seated conviction among the framers of our Federal Constitution that a Federal Government composed of several States, each retaining large jurisdiction, was far preferable to a strong central government.

One whose writings inspired much of the thought of the day was Rousseau; his Contrat Social became a standard textbook for the makers of government of those days. In this work, Rousseau says:

> As nature has set limits to the stature of a properly formed man, outside which it produces only giants and dwarfs; so likewise, with regard to the best constitution of a state, there are limits to its possible extent, so that it may be neither too great to enable it to be well governed nor too small to enable it to maintain itself single-handed. There is in every body politic a maximum of force which it can not exceed and which is often diminished as the state is aggrandized. The more the social bond is extended, the more it is weakened; and, in general, a small state is proportionally stronger than a large one.
> A thousand reasons demonstrate the truth of this maxim. In the first place, administration becomes more difficult at great distances, as a weight becomes heavier at the end of a long lever. * * * The same laws can not be suited to so many different provinces, which have different customs and different climates, and can not tolerate the same form of government. * * * The chiefs, overwhelmed with business, see nothing themselves; clerks rule the state. In a word, the measures that must be taken to maintain the general authority, which so many officers at a distance wish to evade or impose upon, absorb all the public attention; no regard for the welfare of the people remains, and scarcely any for their defense in time of need; and thus a body too huge for its constitution sinks and perishes, crushed by its own weight.

Mr. Jefferson, in his first inaugural address, summarized what he termed "the essential principles of our Government," and among the first of these he placed—

The support of the State governments in all their rights as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns and the surest bulwarks against antirepublican tendencies.

It would be a very difficult task for each Member of Congress to so inform himself of the peculiar local conditions prevailing in the numerous manufacturing industries of each separate State, so that he could wisely determine what regulations were best for each. It would be necessary for him to take into consideration the different classes of people that he would have to regulate, the variations of climate, the economic condition of the working people, the different burdens incident to the manufacture of the various products of different manufacturing industries; in short, the different environments and requirements of each industrial plant in each State. This is not practical, and without it it would be unsafe to attempt it.

It would be as unreasonable for Congress to fix an absolute rule to govern the employees in every manufacturing plant in this Union, without regard to the different conditions that surround each, as to prescribe the minimum age below which a girl should not marry, to effect alike the tropical possessions of this country, and our most northern possessions. All will agree that, if Congress possessed this power, it would be necessary to take into consideration this different environment.

A different rule should apply as to age and hours of labor, both as to children and adults, in a bleak New England city, with its severe climate, where the employees of a cotton mill, mostly foreigners, live huddled together in overcrowded and poorly ventilated houses for nine months in the year, where the mill hand hurries from the mill to his home to escape the cold, from that which should apply in a rural village in the balmy Southland, where everyone moves slower, where the houses are far apart and well ventilated, and where there is abundant opportunity for fresh air and balmy sunshine while on duty, and where there is abundant opportunity for play and recreation in the open air when not on duty.

A different age and different hours of labor should prevail for a child who is engaged at a machine that requires a constant mental or physical strain from the time it enters the mill until the working day is over from those that should apply to a doffer in a fine yarn spinning mill in the South, where the work done during the day does not require constant work, and when not employed he is permitted to amuse himself as he pleases, with the one restriction that he must be within calling distance of the foreman, so that when the spools run empty he can be called to take them off and put another set on. As explained in the hearings had on this bill, this is in the main the work required of the younger help in a southern cotton mill.

Notwithstanding my high regard for the wisdom of the Representative from Colorado who makes the report on this bill for the Committee on Labor, who comes from a State that hardly knows what a cotton mill looks like, I can not think that he knows better the needs of the cotton-mill employees in North Carolina than does that splendid body of sincere, humane, and broad-minded men from every county of the State that compose our State legislature. The same observation is true of any other Member of this House who is not familiar with the difficulties, needs, and environments surrounding this growing industry in my State.

But you Members from the New England States who are not familiar with conditions in the South, and you who come from agricultural States who know nothing at first hand of cotton-mill industry, wonder why all this sentiment and prejudice has been created against the southern cotton mills.

The ninth congressional district in North Carolina, which I have the honor to represent, contains a number of well-equipped cotton mills. The men employed in them constitute a very considerable part of the population in at least 6 of the 10 counties in my district. I know them, and when I am down in the district I go among them, speak to them, and am very happy to claim them as my friends.

The industry is not an old one. I have watched its development almost from its beginning. The war left our people too poor to build such costly enterprises, but by the hardest work, by men, women, and children, without too great a care as to the number of hours they worked, and the closest economy, our people restocked their farms and reclaimed their waste lands. We had plenty of water power, and after a time, by the combined efforts of our people, enough money was gotten together to build a few small mills. There were no high-salaried men among them; the manager usually worked harder than the employees. Those who came to work in the mill were, in the main, the less fortunate in the community, who did not own land and had to depend upon making a living by renting land; they were, however, the mill owner's old neighbors and friends with whom he grew up, who called him by his first name, visited him and his family on Sundays and in sickness, and received, in turn, the same kindly attention from him.

It is not necessary for me to tell you that there was a strong bond of friendship between them. The help went from the farm because they could better their condition; they stayed at the mill because they were satisfied. These small ventures proved successful and others were built; other families from the country found employment with them, and thus the industry has grown from this unpretentious beginning.

In the infancy of the industry the mills were not so well equipped, the homes for the employees were not so comfortable, and the same care was not taken of the help. Too often a kind-hearted superintendent yielded to the appeal of some widow with a house full of children, whose only hope to get on the pay roll was through her young children.

As these industries passed the experiment stage, the managers began to realize that their success depended largely upon efficient help and that it was the best policy to guard their health and comfort. I feel safe in asserting that the mills that have been built in my district during the last 10 years are as modern and sanitary in every particular as you can find in any district represented on the floor of the House, with every protection and comfort that has come into general use.

The employees are comfortably housed in healthy buildings. Usually the mill furnishes a large and comfortable hall that serves as a place of worship or for public entertainment. The mill owners were the pioneers in advocating compulsory education. This has nowhere been so effective as among the children in mill villages, for with them they can not now get in the mill until they have attended school for the required length of time each year. The mill owners are anxious that their help be educated and use every means to foster and promote education, in many cases to the extent of largely supplementing the funds provided for public schools.

With all these advantages that are not always accorded the child on the farm, who lives his secluded life, you will not be surprised to learn that the problem of the landowner in my district is to get enough help to run his farm.

But we have always had the agitator; we have, perhaps, not paid enough attention to him. My people are a practical people, and whether you credit them with doing it for the sake of humanity or because they found it a good policy for their business, they have, from year to year, steadily improved the conditions prevailing in the mill village until it is marvelous to me that there are still credulous people with maudlin sentiment enough to contribute their salaries to keep the agitator at his work. We know that as long as the salary is forthcoming the paid agitator will keep on agitating.

We know him and his methods as well as we know the cheap itinerant sewing machine agent. With a few cheap pictures taken of God's unfortunates somewhere and a sensational and slanderous report of awful conditions as he found them, he is fully armed to go forth and battle for humanity, knowing well that the moment he reports that conditions have changed he is out of a job and without the very desirable pay envelope.

Prof, Richard Karl Walker, in his publication, "The problem of the southern cotton mill," pays his respects to the representatives of the national child labor committee in the following language:

Of all those attacking the southern cotton manufacturer, the representatives of the national child labor committee are deserving of the severest censure. Their methods are vicious; their practices are pernicious; the work of their hands is in every sense destructive. With the grin of a sneak and a leer at the manufacturer, the paid agents of this organization turn to the public with a tale of woe and oppression, and, under cover of profuse protestations of interest in the welfare of the operative, they deliver an assassin's thrust at the builder and business of the South's greatest industry.

I know there are men on the national child labor committee who are honest and sincere; there are a lot of people outside of this committee also who believe they are serving God and humanity by fostering the paid agitators on the South. Against all these I have no harsh word to utter.

Did you ever hear of any of these organizations attempting to relieve suffering or in any way relieve against the dire want and poverty that they picture in the reports of conditions that prevail? Is it not strange that their sentiment, if not their judgment, has not suggested to them that they could help in other ways than by an agitation that would merely produce legislation? Did you ever hear of one of these paid agents who has the proof that laws of the States have been violated, in the form of a picture that bore no date to show its age or to indicate how long it had already done service, and nothing to indicate where it purports to have been taken, or who makes a gruesome report of how the lifeblood is being sapped from the child, but fails to name the mill, the parent of the child, or in any way specify so that his falsehood could be exposed, going to the prosecuting officer of the district where such conditions exist, or, if need be, going before a grand jury of that jurisdiction and exposing the violations of law and ask the punishment?

Cotton manufacturing in North Carolina is mainly limited to certain sections. The larger part of the State is almost wholly agricultural. The judges who try such offenders come from the various judicial districts and are independent of any local influences. The vast majority composing the legislature of the State come from sections not affected by any local sentiment of the mills. All of these have the same burning desire to correct evils of every kind that burns in the heart of the sentimentalist. When these act officially, it is not heralded abroad by an agitator; when they do not act, it is because no sufficient evidence has been found to warrant action.

The cotton-mill industry mainly exists in the New England States and in the South, mainly North and South Carolina. The New England States already have labor laws that are held up to us as standards, and it is unreasonable to suppose that this legislation is aimed at them. It is fair to conclude, it seems to me, from a reading of the report and the hearings before the committee and from a review of the situation, that this bill is aimed largely at the South.

It is generally believed and freely talked among millmen and legislators of the South that much of the agitation against the southern cotton manufacturer is carried on at the instance of and with the support of some of the New England States. Why all this demand for a uniform law regulating labor unless it is simply the pretext by which they hope to foist upon the mills of the South the same labor laws and troubles that they experience in New England and thereby lessen competition with them.

On behalf of one of the noblest aggregations of good, plain, honest, and humane business men that ever graced a common enterprise in a State—to whom just credit will some day be given for the noble part they have played in the rebuilding of the South—the pioneer mill builders of the South, I want to thank the Committee on Labor for the scant compliment, which we feel must have been intended for us, when they stated that—

> The evidence from cotton manufacturers indicate a gratifying attention to the welfare of their employees in other respects.

I can not but regret that the committee did not find the time to accept the offer of the southern millmen and go to the South at the expense of the millmen and get full and first-hand information for themselves. The southern millmen offered, in perfect good faith, to charter a car and give the committee every opportunity of knowing the truth. They realize that until they can dissipate the cloud that has been produced to obscure your vision they can hardly hope that you will have a clear understanding of the situation.

Since this bill has been pending in Congress I have received petitions from 1,780 employees fron the mills in my district who oppose this legislation. All of these petitions were introduced by me and referred to the Committee on Labor. I regret that the committee brushed aside these petitions without giving them due consideration or weight.

The bill permits persons between 14 and 16 years to work during the daytime for only eight hours per day. Our people of all ages on farms and public works, in mills, stores, and offices have found it practical to work longer hours than this. If this bill passes, it will not be practical to utilize this privilege between the ages of 14 and 16 in cotton mills. The work of each machine in a well-equipped mill is so timed that if you stop any part of the machinery you cut off the material to be run through the next process, and if part of the help only works eight hours this measures the output of the mill. This would eliminate the work of children between the ages of 14 and 16 at any regular employment in the mills. This result has been demonstrated by the operation of such a law in the State of Kentucky, as shown by Mr. Clark in the hearings before the committee.

There is a bond of friendship between the managers and the help, and they work in harmony because each respects the rights of the other. The mill employees in my district are all white people, and are an independent class who can take care of themselves and would not be easily imposed upon by the managers of the mills.

It is to be regretted that there should ever be a dire necessity to labor, and especially by children, but this condition sometimes exists, and unfortunately those back of this bill have not suggested a remedy for it.

I believe there is a virtue to be derived from honest toil aside from the money return, that could never be developed through idleness. There is no position in a cotton mill that requires an employee to sit fixed in one position under a mental or physical strain during the working day. I have already spoken of the lighter work and freedom accorded the younger employees in the mill. Did a paid agitator ever show you a group picture of the doffer boys, on the river bank stripped for a swim, during the time they were not needed in the performance of their daily work? Or a group of these boys and girls sitting out in the grove enjoying the open air and sunshine until they were again needed? These are familiar sights which might be photographed almost any summer day at a rural mill. What better place could be suggested for them than to permit them to go with their parent into the mill where they would receive oversight and care? Place yourself in the position of the father of a boy, who works in a mill, and tell me what he is to do with this boy between the ages of 12 and 16, when the school term is out. There is nothing else for him to do. He is far better off for having done light work with his father than to have loafed around the mill village learning bad habits and getting into mischief. A boy or girl that never acquires the habit of honest toil before they reach the age of 16, enters live under a serious handicap.

Our mill employees are against this bill because it prescribes an unreasonable restriction upon their inherent right to labor and because it would deprive them of the right to teach their children industry and have them help in a reasonable way to contribute toward the family expense.

Section 4, which provides for the agents and detectives, is not only unnecessary, but it is an unwarranted reflection upon the law-abiding mill men everywhere. The main thing that it would accomplish, in so far as the cotton mill of the South is concerned, would be to furnish employment for some self-styled moral censor, and an army of inquisitors, always spying and prying into these industries which give honest employment to thousands of needy people.

Section 2 of the bill is so harsh and unreasonable that I find it difficult to seriously discuss it. It provides: "Section 2. Proof of employment within 60 days prior to shipment of such product therefrom," of a child under the prohibitions of section 1, "shall be prima facie evidence that such product has been produced in whole or in part by the labor of such a child." This must be considered in connection with section 8, which says:

> That in prosecutions under this act each shipment or delivery for shipment shall constitute a separate offense.

It is a matter of common knowledge that the southern cotton mills sell a part of their product in the markets of the State. In the manufacture of this there would be no law prohibiting the labor of a child of 12 years, while there was no term of their school, and yet his mere employment in the mill would be sufficient to make out a prima facie case, not for one shipment, but for every shipment in interstate commerce for more than two months thereafter. Ordinarily, we presume a person innocent until the State or Government proves him guilty, but in this case it is reversed and he is presumed guilty for perhaps a hundred different offenses, if he should happen to have made that number of shipments in interstate commerce within the following 60 days. The managers of a large mill would be absolutely unable to know whether they had a good defense or not if they attempted to live up to the privileges granted under the State law, and which were forbidden by the act of Congress. The enforcement of this bill would effectively destroy all rights on the part of the State to prescribe rules bearing upon the subject.

He would not be prosecuted in his local courts but must be dragged away to a Federal court for trial.

This rule of evidence would furnish a vigilant sneak an opportunity of harrassing a manufacturer past endurance, whether innocent or guilty, and invites the vengeance of any enemy it might have.

The fact that this law also applies to a "dealer" would give it the practical effect of requiring a guaranty to accompany every package sent out by the mill, whether sent within the State or beyond, for should it ever become the subject of interstate commerce the dealer who delivered it for shipment might then be convicted under the drastic provisions of this bill, and the only way he could feel safe would be to have the protection the guaranty would afford.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE MEASURE.

I now come to a discussion of what seems to me to be the most serious matter involved—whether such legislation can be justified by any power granted to Congress by the Constitution.

If this power exists in Congress it must be found in what is known as the commerce clause of the Constitution, which confers upon Congress the right to regulate commerce with foreign nations, between the States, and with the Indian tribes. If it is not so delegated to Congress, then it is clear that by the tenth amendment to the Federal Constitution it is reserved to the States.

It seems to me unfortunate that the Committee on Labor did not give greater consideration to the constitutionality of the measure before so earnestly and strongly recommending its passage. It is true that they concluded that the measure was within the power of Congress to enact, but this question seems, however, not to have received the grave consideration that a question of this importance should demand. I say this because of the attitude shown toward this question in the report. On page 13 they say they invited a full discussion of this phase of the proposed legislation, but following this they add:

Needless to say, however, your committee did this, not with a view to arrogate to themselves the duty of passing judgment upon a problem of constitutional law but rather with a view of provoking discussion and of informing themselves and Congress as to the general attitude upon this problem of experts familiar with the authorities and the trend of judicial thought.

In asking the House to seriously consider its constitutionality I am but asking you to follow the precedent set by your predecessors. This same constitutional question confronted the Members of the Fifty-ninth Congress. So zealous were they in the discharge of their sworn duty that, before they were willing to take up and consider the expediency of such legislation, they referred a resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, asking them to advise the House as to the constitutionality of the measure. On that committee there were able lawyers, and through its chairman, Judge Jenkins, it unanimously reported to the House that—

The committee is of the opinion that Congress has no jurisdiction or authority over the subject of woman and child labor and has no authority to suppress any abuses of such labor or ameliorate conditions surrounding the employment of such labor.

This report reviews the authorities bearing upon the question and sets out very clearly the reasons that led the committee to its conclusion.

After carefully reviewing the authorities cited by Mr. KEATING and by Judge Jenkins and the recent decisions of the courts bearing upon the question, I have clearly reached the conclusion that the power to enact legislation here proposed is not conferred upon Congress by the Federal Constitution, but is reserved to the several States, and that it would be dangerous and unwise to attempt to give to the Constitution such a strained construction.

Chief Justice Fuller, in writing the opinion for the Supreme Court in the case of United States against E. C. Knight Co. (156 U. S., I), says:

It is vital that the independence of the commercial power and of the police power and the delimitation between them, however sometimes perplexing, should always be recognized and observed, for while the one furnishes the strongest bond of union the other is essential to the preservation of the autonomy of the States as required by our dual form of Government; and acknowledged evils, however grave and urgent they may appear to be, had better be borne than the risk be run, in the effort to suppress them, of more serious consequences by resort to expedients of even doubtful constitutionality.

If our dual form of government is to last, it is necessary that we set a limit to what Mr. KEATING, in his report on the pending bill, calls "the broadening view of the power of Congress under the interstate-commerce clause."

In this day of world war we can read in almost any daily paper of how our very existence as a Nation is threatened by a fancied attack from some foreign enemy. Such a thing is awful to contemplate. We can console ourselves that such may never come. But unless we can adopt a safe limit, beyond which the power of the Federal Government, by strained construction of the commerce clause of the Constitution can not go, we shall have our dual form of government destroyed. Against it there is no consolation that a better Government may be formed.

We, as Members of Congress, are all inclined to stretch a power needed to accomplish what we strive for and desire, and especially when we feel we are doing it in behalf of a righteous cause, but by reaching out a little further each time we are gradually appropriating to ourselves the reserved power which originally and still belongs to the States. And when this absorption of power has become complete, this Government will no longer be a Nation made up of sovereign States but a Nation composed of taxing districts, which will inevitably fall.

By encroachment, we would throw away what Tocqueville considered "a great discovery in modern political science," and destroy the distinguishing feature of our Constitution, which Gladstone described as "the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man."

If the Constitution had not prescribed the limits to our congressional power, it seems that such encroachment still would not be a wise policy to pursue. Thomas Jefferson says, in his autobiography:

Were not this great country already divided into States, that division must be made, that each might do for itself what concerns itself directly, and which it can so much better do than a distant authority.

Mr. Lincoln said in his first inaugural address:

It is my duty and my oath to maintain inviolate the right of the States to order and control under the Constitution their own affairs by their own judgment exclusively. Such maintenance is essential for a preservation of that balance of power on which our institutions rest.

Senator Edmunds said in a debate in the Senate:

I believe that the safety of the Republic as a Nation—one people, one hope, one destiny—depends more largely upon the preservation of what are called the rights of the States than upon any one thing.

Senator Elihu Root, in his Princeton lectures upon the Constitution, delivered last year, declares that:

On the other hand, if the power of the Nation would override that of the States and usurp their functions, we should have this vast country, with its great population, inhabiting widely separated regions, differing in climate, in production, in industrial and social interests and ideas, governed in all its local affairs by one all-powerful central Government at Washington, imposing upon the home life and behavior of each community the opinions and ideas of propriety of distant majorities. Not only would this be intolerable and alien to the idea of free self-government, but it would be beyond the power of a central Government to do directly. Decentralization would be made necessary by the mass of Government business to be transacted, and so our separate localities would come to be governed by delegated authorities, by proconsuls authorized from Washington to execute the will of the great majority of the whole people. No one can doubt that this also would lead by its different routes to the separation of our Union. Preservation of our dual system of government, carefully restrained in each of its parts by the limitations of the Constitution, has made possible our growth in local self-government and national power in the past, and, so far as we can see, it is essential to the continuance of that Government in the future.

If Senator Root had sought to illustrate to the Princeton students just what he meant in this abstract discourse upon our Government, its dangers or tendencies, he could not have found one that so well illustrates the necessity of preserving to the States the powers that have been reserved to them by the Constitution, than the provisions of this bill we are now considering.

My contention is that the sole purpose of this bill is to regulate manufacture by prescribing the age and hours of labor of persons who are to be permitted to work in mines or factories, and that it bears within its terms and provisions evidence of its real purpose, and that a court can see, as can every Member of this House, that it is not for the purpose of regulating commerce between the States at all.

Mr. Justice Lamar said, in Kidd v. Pierson (126 U. S., p. 1):

No distinction is more popular to the common mind or more clearly expressed in economic and political literature than that between manufacture and commerce. Manufacture is transformation—the fashioning of raw materials into a change of form for use. The functions of commerce are different. The buying and selling and the transportation incident thereto constitute commerce; and the regulation of commerce in the constitutional sense embraces the regulation at least of such transportation. * * * If it be held that the term includes the regulation of all such manufactures as are intended to be the subject of commercial transactions in the future, it is impossible to deny that it would also include all productive industries that contemplate the same thing. The result would be that Congress would be invested, to the exclusion of the States, with the power to regulate, not only manufactures, but also agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, mining—in short, every branch of human industry. For is there one of them that does not contemplate, more or less clearly, an interstate or foreign market? Does not the wheat grower of the Northwest and the cotton planter of the South plant, cultivate, and harvest his crop with an eye on the prices at Liverpool, New York, and Chicago? The power being vested in Congress and denied to the States, it would follow as an inevitable result that the duty would devolve on Congress to regulate all of these delicate, multiform, and vital interests—interests which in their nature are and must be local in all the details of their successful management.

It is not necessary to enlarge on, but also to suggest the impracticability of such a scheme, when we regard the multitudinous affairs involved and the almost infinite variety of their minute details. * * * * * * Any movement toward the establishment of rules of production in this vast country, with its many different climates and opportunities, could only be at the sacrifice of the peculiar advantages of a large part of the localities in it, if not of every one of them. On the other hand, any movement toward the local, detailed, and incongruous legislation required by such interpretation would be about the widest possible departure from the declared object of the clause in question. Nor this alone. Even in the exercise of the power contended for, Congress would be confined to the regulation, not of certain branches of industry, however numerous, but to those instances in each and every branch where the producer contemplated an interstate market. These instances would be almost infinite, as we have seen; but still there would always remain the possibility, and often it would be the case, that the producer contemplated a domestic market. In that case the supervisory power must be executed by the State; and the interminable trouble would be presented, that whether the one power or the other should exercise the authority in question would be determined not by any general or intelligent rule but by the secret and changeable intention of the producer in each and every act of production. A situation more paralyzing to the State governments and more productive of conflicts between the General Government and the States and less likely to have been what the framers of the Constitution intended it would be difficult to imagine. * * *

This court has already decided that the fact that an article was manufactured for export to another State does not of itself make it an article of interstate commerce within the meaning of section 8, article 1, of the Constitution, and that the intent of the manufacturer does not determine the time when the article or product passes from the control of the State and belongs to commerce.

So we see that the decision of the United States Supreme Court, upholding the right of the State and denying this right to Congress, is a direct authority upon the question presented in this bill.

The case of Adair against the United States (208 U. S., 161) passes upon the right of Congress to make it a crime for a carrier engaged in interstate commerce to discharge an employee simply because of his membership in a labor organization. Mr. Justice Harlan, in delivering the opinion of the court, denying this right to Congress, said:

The general right to make a contract in relation to his business is part of the liberty of the individual protected by the fourteenth amendment of the Federal Constitutfon. (Allgeyer v. Louisiana, 165 U. S., 578.) Under that provision no State can deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. The right to purchase or sell labor is part of the liberty protected by this amendment unless there are circumstances which exclude the right.

The opinion, then, recognizes the right of the State, through its police power to regulate these rights by fair, reasonable, and appropriate laws. This same opinion says:

Manifestly, any rule prescribed for the conduct of interstate commerce, in order to be within the competency of Congress under its power to regulate commerce among the States, must have some real or substantial relation to or connection with the commerce regulated. But what possible legal or logical connection is there between an employee's membership in a labor organization and the carrying on of interstate commerce? Such relation to a labor organization can not have, in itself and in the eye of the law, any bearing upon the commerce with which the employee is connected by his labor and services. * * * If such a power exists in Congress, it is difficult to perceive why it might not, by absolute regulation, require interstate carriers, under penalties, to employ in the conduct of its interstate business only members of labor organizations or only those who are not members of such organizations—a power which could not be recognized as existing under the Constitution of the United States. No such rule of criminal liability as that to which we have referred can be regarded as, in any just sense, a regulation of interstate commerce. We need scarcely repeat what this court has more than once said, that the power to regulate interstate commerce, great and paramount as that power is, can not be exerted in violation of any fundamental right secured by other provisions of the Constitution. (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1, 196; Lottery Case, 188 U. S., 321, 353.)

It results, on the whole case, that the provision of the statute under which the defendant was convicted must be held to be repugnant to the fifth amendment and is not embraced by nor within the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, but under the guise of regulating interstate commerce and as applied to this case it arbitrarily sanctions an illegal invasion of the personal liberty as well as the right of property of the defendant Adair.

There is much more reason to contend that Congress can prescribe the qualifications of a man to be employed in handling interstate commerce, the very agency employed in the traffic, than there is to say that Congress can say who shall be employed in a mill or mine that makes a product that may find its way into interstate commerce.

Mr. Justice Bradley, delivering the opinion of the court in the case of Coe against Errol (116 U. S., 517, 525), says:

There must be a point of time when they (logs cut and hauled to a river town to be transported, interstate) cease to be governed by the domestic law and begin to be governed and protected by the national law of commercial regulation, and that moment seems to us to be a legitimate one for this purpose in which they commence their final movement from the State of their origin to that of their destination.

This appeals to our common sense, and if it be good law, then the earliest moment an act of Congress could get hold of and regulate a product from a mill or mine would be when that product has been delivered at the depot of the common carrier for transportation beyond the State. All right to say that the general health of the employees required that they be not allowed to work in a given enterprise before they reached a certain age, or before a certain hour of the day, would have nothing to do with commerce, and Congress could not regulate these. The last opinion quoted from continues:

It can not be denied that the power of a State to protect the lives, health, and property of its citizens, and to preserve good order and the public morals, "the power to govern men and things within the limits of its dominion," is a power originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to the General Government nor directly restrained by the Constitution of the United States, and essentially exclusive.

To the same effect is the decision of The Daniel Ball, Tenth Wallace, 557, 565:

Whenever a commodity has begun to move as an article of trade from one State to another, commerce in that commodity between the States has commenced.

We are referred to certain cases in which the Supreme Court has upheld the law, which are regarded by the advocates of this bill as some authority for upholding the provisions of this bill. In all of these we can find a distinguishing feature that completely differentiates them from the provision of the one under consideration.

Every article that has been excluded from commerce by an act of Congress has been an article that was bad in itself, immoral, or fraudulent. Such articles are spoken of in some of the opinions as outlawed. Justice Harlan described it in the lottery case as the kind of traffic which no one can be entitled to pursue as a mattery of right.

In the case of lottery tickets it required interstate commerce to complete the gambling contract, and in this way commerce became a potent factor in promoting the gambling contracts.

In the pure-food cases the thing prohibited was bad, dangerous, and fraudulent; in the white-slave traffic act the subject of the traffic which was forbidden was the person of the woman for immoral purposes; but in the case presented here there is nothing inherently dangerous or bad in cotton yarn or cloth made by a person under the age limit prescribed or in violation of the hour limit named. It can have no harmful effect upon those to whom it is shipped. Mr. Justice Peckham, in Schollenberger v. Pennsylvania (171 U. S., p. 12), says:

The general rule to be deducted from the decisions of this court is that a lawful article can not be wholly excluded from importation into a State from another State where it was manufactured or grown.

Eminent authorities have, however, discussed the very question raised in this bill—the question as to whether Congress could prohibit the shipment in interstate commerce of goods made by child labor. Upon this subject ex-President Taft, in his work on Popular Government, has this to say:

Bills have been urged upon Congress to forbid interstate commerce in goods made by child labor. Such proposed legislation has failed chiefly because it was thought beyond the Federal power. The distinction between the power exercised in enacting the pure food and that which would have been necessary in the case of the child labor is that Congress in the former is only preventing interstate commerce from being a vehicle for conveyance of something which would be injurious to people at its destination, and it might properly decline to permit the use of interstate commerce for that detrimental result. In the latter case Congress would be using its regulative power of interstate commerce not to effect any result of interstate commerce. Articles made by child labor are presumably as good and useful as articles made by adults. The proposed law is to be enforced to discourage the making of articles by child labor in the State from which the articles were shipped. In other words, it seeks indirectly and by duress to compel the States to pass a certain kind of legislation that is completely within their discretion to enact or not. Child labor in the State of shipment has no legitimate or germane relation to the interstate commerce of which the goods thus made are to form a part, to its character, or to its effect. Such an attempt of Congress to use its power of regulating such commerce to suppress the use of child labor in the State of shipment would be a clear usurpation of that State's rights.

In Watson on the Constitution the subject is treated under the title, "Articles made by women and children, and transportation thereof," as follows:

Closely akin to the question of regulating manufacturing is the question whether Congress can forbid the hauling of a commodity, by a carrier of interstate commerce, which was manufactured in a State, for instance, by women or children under a certain age as has been recently maintained. This question is of far-reaching effect, and if such power exists in Congress it would result in the most complete invasion of the sovereignty of the States by the General Government which has ever been accomplished under the Federal Constitution.

The author then reviews at length the decision in Kidd against Pearson, United States against Knight Co., the Lottery Case, and a number of others, and finally concludes:

There is no power in Congress to control the manufacture of goods in the States destined for interstate or foreign commerce, and consequently Congress is unable to control the labor of persons engaged in manufacturing products in the States which are intended for interstate or foreign business. Such regulations are left to the State. The power to make such regulations resided there before the Constitution was adopted or the Union was formed and it was not surrendered by the States to the General Government.

But why multiply authorities, all to the same effect? It has been boldly asserted that the report of the Committee on Labor, which recommends the passage of this bill, cites no precedent in the annals of Congress itself nor any authoritative deliverance from any judicial tribunal to sustain it.

Is it possible that this House will not take counsel of the great constitutional lawyers and statesmen of the past or present; that it will not be guided by the official and authoritative utterances of our highest judicial tribunal, whose duty it is to give the last and final interpretation to our Constitution?

If there are those in this House who do not feel a binding force in the limitations of power contained in the Constitution, I desire to call to their attention the words of Judge Cooley:

Legislators have their authority measured by the Constitution. They are chosen to do what it permits and nothing more, and they take solemn oath to obey and support it. When they disregard its provisions they usurp authority, abuse their trust, and violate the promise they have confirmed by an oath. To pass an act when they are in doubt whether it is not violating the Constitution is to treat as of no force the most imperative obligations any person can assume. A business agent who would deal in that manner with his principal's business would be treated as untrustworthy; a witness in court who would treat his oath thus lightly and affirm things concerning which he was in doubt would be held a criminal. Indeed, it is because the legislature has applied the judgment of its members to the question of its authority to pass the proposed law, and has only passed it after being satisfied of the authority, that the judiciary waive their own doubts and give it their support.

Section 4 of the bill, which provides for inspection of mills and mines if they ever produce articles for interstate commerce, is indefensible from the standpoint of its constitutionality. It does not even pretend to limit the inspection to the goods produced for interstate shipment; and, indeed, it would be impossible to distinguish between those for intrastate and those for interstate shipment during the course of their production. It attempts to override all the reserved rights of the States and to draw under its full inspection all such enterprises. What has already been said as to the unconstitutionality of the main feature of the bill applies with even greater force to this section.

I close by quoting the strong language used by Judge Jenkins in his report to the Fifty-ninth Congress, already referred to:

In fact, it is not a debatable question. It would be a reflection upon the intelligence of Congress to so legislate. It would be casting an unwelcome burden upon the Supreme Court to so legislate. The agitation of such legislation produces an uneasy feeling among the people and confuses the average mind as to the power of Congress and the power of the States. The lives, health, and property of the women and children engaged in labor is exclusively within the power of the States, originally and always belong to the States, not surrendered by them to Congress. Such is the emphatic language of the Supreme Court. If a question of good order or morals, it is the same. The argument has long since been made by others, and the committee can not add to it. The assertion of such power by Congress would destroy every vestige of State authority, obliterate State lines, nullify the great work of the framers of the Constitution, and leave the State governments mere matters of form, devoid of power, and ought to more than satisfy the fondest dreams of those favoring centralization of power.

I regard such attempted legislation by Congress as bad, considered from the standpoint of public policy, and when looked at from the standpoint of its constitutionality as a dangerous usurpation. Manufacture is no part of commerce. Then, how can the control of commerce by Congress give Congress control over manufacture.

The bill, in my opinion, is clearly unconstitutional, and I should regret to see the House pass such a void measure and thus set such a dangerous precedent.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the chairman of the Committee on Labor I yield some time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. COPLEY].

Mr. COPLEY. Mr. Chairman, on June 17, 1913, I introduced the following bill:

A bill (H. R. 6146) to further regulate interstate and foreign commerce by prohibiting interstate transportation of the products of certain forms of child labor, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the labor of children in certain industries and under certain conditions hereinafter described is hereby defined as antisocial child labor, and that this act shall be known, referred to, and cited as the Federal child-labor act.

SEC. 2. That the employment of a child under 14 years of age in any mill, factory, cannery, workshop, manufacturing or mechanical establishment, or of a child under 16 years of age in any coal mine, coal breaker, coke oven, quarry, or in any establishment where poisonous or dangerous acids, gases, or dyes are used, manufactured, or packed, or in any establishment wherein the work done or materials or equipment handled are dangerous to the life and limb or injurious to the health or morals of such a child is hereby designated and defined as antisocial child labor and as detrimental to the general welfare and debasing to commerce.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Labor, within six months after the passage of this act, to classify and make public a list of such businesses or industries as are included within those described in section 2 of this act, together with a list of the products of such businesses or industries; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Labor to revise from time to time said public list as the changing character of industrial establishments or additional information received by the Secretary of Labor shall warrant and require.

SEC. 4. That any person, firm, or corporation which owns or operates a business or establishment designated in section 2 of this act and included within those businesses or industries listed by the Secretary of Labor as herein required, may make or cause to be made by his duly authorized agent an affidavit to the effect that no antisocial child labor is employed in his business or establishment, and that the products thereof are not produced with the aid of antisocial child labor. When such an affidavit in the form duly approved by the Secretary of Labor is filed with the Secretary of Labor, the Secretary of Labor shall issue a certificate to the maker of the said affidavit, or to the person, firm, or corporation in whose behalf said affidavit is made, giving authority to said person, firm, or corporation to stamp or label the goods and products of such business or establishment in the following manner: "Registered under the Federal child-labor act, Serial No. ——." The serial number certified by the Secretary of Labor shall be the number given to the affidavit on file by virtue of which said certificate is made as herein provided.

SEC. 5. That six months from and after the passage of this act no carrier of interstate commerce shall knowingly accept for initial interstate transportation or knowingly transport initially in interstate commerce the goods or products of any business or establishment described in section 2 of this act and included within those businesses or industries listed by the Secretary of Labor as herein provided which have been made with the aid of antisocial child labor or have been made in any business or establishment in which antisocial child labor is employed; and no jobber, wholesaler, manufacturer, producer, or other dealer in such goods and products shall knowingly make initial shipment or knowingly offer for initial shipment in interstate commerce any such goods or products so made: Provided, however, That in case any such goods or products the interstate transportation whereof is hereby prohibited shall be presented for transportation and transported, stamped and labeled "Registered under the Federal child-labor act, Serial No. ——," as provided in section 4 of this act, the carrier, jobber, wholesaler, or other dealer in such goods or products, excepting the manufacturer or producer thereof, responsible for such interstate transportation shall be presumed to have been ignorant of the fact that such goods or products were of the character prohibited by this act.

SEC. 6. That within six months from and after passage of this act the Secretary of Labor shall examine the laws of the several States relating to the employment of child labor and give public notice and certify to the governor of each of the several States whether or not, in the opinion of the Secretary of Labor, the law of each particular State substantially prohibits and effectively prevents antisocial child labor as herein defined; and the Secretary of Labor shall from time to time make such revision of his certificate regarding the laws of the several States as the changes therein, or additional information by him received, shall warrant or require; and for the purposes of this act the judgment and decision of the Secretary of Labor as to whether the laws of a particular State substantially prohibit and effectively prevent antisocial child labor as herein defined shall be final. The provisions of this act prohibiting interstate transportation of the products of antisocial child labor as herein defined shall not apply either to the carrier of interstate commerce or to the manufacturer, producer, jobber, wholesaler, or other dealer offering for interstate transportation, or accepting for or transporting in interstate transportation, any initial shipment from a State certified by the Secretary of Labor as prohibiting and preventing antisocial child labor into any other State or Territory.

SEC. 7. That any officer or agent of any carrier of interstate commerce, or of any person, firm, corporation, or any other person who knowingly is a party to any violation of this act, or who knowingly violates any provision of this act, shall be punished for each offense by fine of not more than $5,000 nor less than $100, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both said fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. Any person making affidavit to the Secretary of Labor, as provided in section 3, and making a false statement in such affidavit, or any person stamping or labeling goods or products in the manner provided in section 4 of this act, without authority from the Secretary of Labor as provided in said section, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000 nor less than $100, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 8. That any person required, for the protection of a carrier of interstate commerce, to make a written statement as to whether or not goods or products are offered for initial shipment as herein defined, or have been produced with the aid of antisocial child labor, who knowingly makes a false statement in writing in response to such inquiry, shall be fined not exceeding $5,000 nor less than $100; and any carrier of interstate commerce is hereby empowered and permitted to refuse to accept for interstate transportation any goods or products regarding which the shipper refuses to make such written statement upon demand of said carrier.

SEC. 9. That the term "interstate transportation" as used in this act is hereby defined as all transportation which is a part of interstate commerce comprised within the term "commerce among the several States" as used in the Constitution of the United States. The term "business or establishment" as used in this act is hereby defined as any place where work is done for compensation of any sort. The word "person" as used in this act is hereby defined to include any individual, male or female, any partnership or other unincorporated or incorporated organization, or any municipality, public or private institution or organization. The masculine pronoun wherever used in this act shall include other genders, and the singular number shall include the plural. The term "goods or products" shall include any substance, article, or chattel of any kind made or produced or upon which or in connection with which any kind of work is done in any business or establishment as defined in this act. The term "initial shipment" or "initial transportation" or similar term as used in this act is hereby defined as the first shipment or transportation of goods or products in interstate transportation subsequent to their production or manufacture.

This was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. No hearings were ever held and it slept peacefully until the expiration by limitation of the Sixty-third Congress, when it carried this child-labor bill into oblivion.

On January 26, 1914, seven months and nine days after I introduced House bill 6146, Mr. A. Mitchell Palmer, a Democratic member of the Sixty-third Congress, introduced a bill of similar import (H. R. 12292). This bill was referred to the Committee on Labor; was reported out on August 13, 1914 (H. Rept. 1400); passed the House on February 15, 1915; was put on the Senate Calendar March 1, 1915; and it, too, died a peaceful death at the expiration by limitation of the Sixty-third Congress.

Mr. Palmer was a candidate for the United States Senate from the State of Pennsylvania when he introduced his bill, and it must be perfectly clear to every Member of Congress why his bill was reported out of the committee and mine was not. The Democratic managers thought it might help gain a Senator from Pennsylvania.

On December 6, 1915, the opening day of the Sixty-fourth Congress, I reintroduced the same bill, which was known as H. R. 6146 in the Sixty-third Congress. This time it was known as H. R. 666. This bill was again referred to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.

On January 7, 1916, one month and one day later, Mr. EDWARD KEATING, a Democratic Member from Colorado, introduced a bill of similar import, H. R. 8234, which was referred to the Committee on Labor. Again this committee took the bill under consideration and reported it to this House, with amendments, on January 17, 1916.

Again, it must be apparent to every student of practical politics why the bill which I introduced has not been taken up and the bill introduced by a Democratic Member, who will undoubtedly need help in the next election, was substituted for consideration, although it was introduced 32 days later.

But this question is of too great moment to the welfare of the people of this country to allow personal wishes to interfere with its progress. I am as heartily and as sincerely for this bill as though it were the exact measure which I introduced.

I am not going to appeal to your humanity. That has been done for more than a generation, and if the heart of any Member of Congress has not already been touched there is little hope that mere words will accomplish anything at this last moment. If the heartstrings are not already attuned, they probably never will be. I shall, therefore, address myself to two entirely different phases of the question; that is, to justice and to economics. We founded our great democracy on the principle that all men are created free and equal, but there is another self-evident truth which goes with it, viz, that all men should have an equal opportunity under our laws. Every man owes it to his fellow men banded together into organized society to work, to do something of value in life; and organized society is equally interested with himself that his strength shall be so conserved that his earning power at the end of life shall represent the maximum of possible achievement. Organized society presents most of the opportunities and is entitled to a considerable part of the wealth created by each individual. Wealth is not a bad thing in itself. Why, my old teacher in political economy, in describing the beginning of wealth, used this figure: "It probably had its origin when the ape hunting for his breakfast found two coconuts and could only eat one. With an instinct born of countless generations of experience he remembered that some morning he had been unable to find a coconut, so he ate one and hid the other against some future morning when he again might be hungry and again be unable to find anything to eat."

This was the beginning of wealth, and from that time until the present the fundamental idea of wealth has been that it is something that stands between humanity and want—between humanity and suffering. Following out this fundamental idea, it is one of the greatest blessings the world has ever known, and on this, as a foundation, the splendid and complex organization of society has been gradually builded as century after century has rolled around.

Wealth has never done any wrong. It is only when men have used it for purposes of oppression—for purposes of self-aggrandizement—that wealth has ever been anything but a blessing to the humblest member of organized society. The man who creates it is entitled to a large proportion of it, and its very creation presents an added bulwark between humanity and suffering, and so we are all interested in seeing that every man has a fair chance to produce the maximum amount during his lifetime.

The maximum earning power of a man is the largest amount which can be determined by multiplying the number of years of his usefulness by the product he can turn out per year, and that is a problem in which each individual is interested, and also in which organized society is interested.

Every Member here who represents a farming constituency feels instinctively that every farmer in his district knows that he must not put a harness on a colt until it has arrived at a certain point in its physical development—feels instinctively that if he does he impairs the general usefulness and value of the colt to himself, and the farmer who violates this simple rule is considered a downright idiot by his neighbors. If this is true with our domestic animals, how much more is it true of our future citizens. There are plenty of good men and women in this country who have spent their lives in making experts of themselves on this particular problem. They know that the child can not develop into its full strength and usefulness when put to work too early, and the ages of limitation of all these bills to which I have referred are practically developed from exactly the same source—the consensus of opinion of the great experts of this country who have spent their lives studying this one particular question.

I wonder if it has ever occurred to you what the real value of a child is to this country. Why, the wealth of the country is increasing at a rate of seven or eight billions of dollars a year. This has all been created—and future wealth will be created—by the natural resources of this country, combined with the work of our men and women, and so the mere dollars and cents value to organized society—to this country—of every child born, if he lives the natural course of life, will amount to several thousand dollars.

Why, in one part of our country, when labor was involuntary and men were chattels, they used to bring several hundred dollars apiece, simply representing what they could earn for the man who had the right to direct their labor and to take unto himself the fruits thereof, after paying for their keep. In those days men knew enough to treat the children of slaves well because of the economic loss in their possible earning power if they were set to work so early; that the total earning of their lifetime would be diminished.

In fact, it was left for our free institutions, developed along individual lines and by a large number of different units, to violate this physical law when applied to free humans, which was then so obvious with slavery and is now so universally patent when applied to domestic animals.

Every soul has a "right to a place in the sun." Industry owes every man his life and his health. It can not guarantee it in specific terms, but from the standpoint of self-interest we must all see to it that we come as near as possible in guaranteeing to each individual not only his life and his health but his maximum earning power as well.

Most of the objections to this bill have come from people who say they believe in the principle but want the various States to exercise this particular function, each as best suits its own conditions. Why, you can not have uniformity with 48 different States legislating. We have not the same kind of laws for inheritance or the same kind of laws for marriage or divorce. We have not the same sort of laws governing aggregations of wealth banded together into corporations; and just as every incorporation seeks the States that are most liberal in their charters to corporations, so industry of certain kinds would naturally seek the States in which there is least trouble with laws governing child and female labor. A manufacturer in one State having enlightened laws on this subject could not compete with another in a State which is willing to weave the life-blood of children and women into its products. There can be no successful and intelligent regulation of child labor until the effort is nationalized in its scope and each State stands exactly on the same basis.

With the national law it would cost the manufacturers of one State just as much as it would those located in another State, and competition between them would be reduced to one of intelligence, application, industry—to the survival of the fittest. Then if we find our industries are going to suffer from foreign competition, where, perhaps, they are not as advanced in the conservation of children as we are, it is a very easy matter to preserve, at any rate, our own markets by assessing a tax in the form of an import duty against such products; but, as a matter of fact, we shall suffer no inconvenience of this sort, because every civilized nation on earth—and they are the only ones who could compete with us—is further advanced in this, the most important item of all schemes of conservation, than we are ourselves.

Mr. Chairman, the passage of this bill will mark the greatest stride toward real democracy that this country has ever taken since the first landing in Jamestown, and I hope the bill prevails and that it soon becomes a law of our land. It will insure a race of better producers. This means added wealth, better distributed, and more comfort and happiness for our people.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I would like to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VARE].

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, when this bill reaches the five-minute rule I propose to offer amendments.

Mr. Chairman, I intend to vote for this bill to prevent interstate shipment of the products of child labor because I believe it helps to insure American youth in its inalienable right to health and education.

Education is the foundation of all real reform. The argument has been made that some of the social-betterment legislation, designed to protect children, must disturb the natural order of living. Some children, it is said, must work to keep themselves alive. It is a commentary upon the present order of things, however, that complete provision has not been made for all such cases.

The trouble with the old system, wherein employers were free to carry on their business by employing children, was to be found in the fact that the employment of the children frequently deprived their own adult male relatives of work. Because it was cheaper to employ the children, the fathers and adult brothers of the family sometimes found it difficult to procure employment.

I maintain that in passing laws to prevent the youth of America from being impaired, physically and mentally, we are merely providing aids to nature's own laws. This is not a radical movement, but on the contrary, it is sound and conservative. This reform should go a long ways toward correcting evils at their very root, preserving the health and insuring the education of future generations, which, by reason of these constructive laws, will give the United States a higher standard of general intelligence, greater national vigor, and greater prosperity.

Forty-five State and territorial legislatures and the Congress of the United States in the year 1915 passed laws affecting children. Even Alaska has forbidden the employment of boys under 16 years of age underground in mines. What we need now, however, is a uniform law which will do away with the inequalities, which will straighten out the situation wherein the canners of one State may employ children, where the canners of another, under the State law, can not. The fact that the manufacturers working under humane laws must compete with those still employing little children marks an inequality that places a premium upon social reaction.

Of all the States that have passed laws affecting children, Pennsylvania was the leader in 1915. We now have on our statute books the most advanced child-labor law in the Nation—a law which makes certain the education of such children as must work in order that they shall live.

In no other State will there be found a more advanced, yet practical, law for the protection of children. Our Pennsylvania law limits the employment of children between the ages of 14 and 16 to 51 hours a week, no child to be employed for more than 9 hours in any one day. The law provides that 8 of the 51 hours must be allowed for the education of the child so employed, and vocational schools are being provided for the education of these children who, unfortunately, must work to live.

This humane and practical law, giving the maximum of benefit to the child, was made possible by the experience and ability of the governor of Pennsylvania, Martin G. Brumbaugh, who had devoted 25 years of his life to the development and education of children. As superintendent of schools in Philadelphia, and previously in other eminent educational positions—for a time as the organizer of the school system of Porto Rico, to which task he was set by President McKinley—Dr. Brumbaugh studied the problem of conserving and developing the youth of the country, and when he became governor he went to work on a model child-labor law, which he finally induced the legislature to pass against the will of some of the prominent leaders of his own party.

The bill we are considering to-day should nationalize the movement for the conservation of the health of children and their education. It adopts the only possible method for putting the Government's veto upon the employment of children of tender age in mills, canneries, workshops, factories, and manufacturing establishments. It will prevent the employment of children under 14 years of age and limit the hours of children between 14 and 16 to eight hours a day and six days a week. This is as little as the Government can afford to do. My only regret is that Pennsylvania's new system of vocational education can not be worked into this law for the conservation of children; but I believe we are making a distinct movement forward, and my vote will be cast for the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. South Carolina is one of the States referred to in the report of the majority as being without what is therein described as "standard provisions" in its labor laws. Under the child-labor law in the State of South Carolina, the employment of any child under the age of 12 is prohibited absolutely. In the employment of any child between the ages of 12 and 14, the owner or superintendent of a manufacturing establishment must require of the parent or guardian of the child a sworn statement as to the age and birthplace of the child seeking employment, which statement must be forwarded to the commissioner of commerce and industries, who is thereupon authorized to issue a permit of employment. The furnishing of a false statement as to the age of a child is made a misdemeanor, punishable by fine or imprisonment.

The employment of any child under the age of 16 between the hours of 8 p. m. and 6 a. m. in any factory is prohibited. There is also a prohibition against the employment of children in any factory in the various occupations set forth in the statute as being dangerous. Under the law permitting the employment of children between the ages of 12 and 15, where permission is secured from the commissioner of labor, there were employed in the cotton mills in South Carolina, according to a census taken by the factory inspectors in August, 1915, 2,562 children, which number is less than the number employed the previous year. Whatever may have been the attitude of mill owners in the past, it is undoubtedly true to-day that a great majority of them are of the opinion that the employment of children under 14 years of age, instead of being advantageous, is in fact injurious to the success of the mill.

I wish to discuss this measure, first, with reference to its constitutionality; second, as to the wisdom of enacting such legislation, even if it is constitutional; and, third, as to the necessity for such legislation by the National Legislature. I believe it is unconstitutional, unwise, and unnecessary.

I know that it has been argued that inasmuch as the ultimate decision as to the constitutionality of a measure must rest with the Supreme Court; that it is unnecessary for Congress to decide beyond all doubt that the measure is unconstitutional. But as has been very ably stated in the report of the minority, a Member of Congress is the first judge before whom such law is presented, and before he can act he must decide that he has a right to do what is proposed.

It was well said by Mr. Cooley in General Principles of Constitutional Law, second edition, page 160:

> Legislators have their authority measured by the Constitution. They are chosen to do what it permits and nothing more, and they take solemn oaths to obey and support it. When they disregard its provisions they usurp authority, abuse their trust, and violate their promise they have confirmed by oath. To pass an act when they are in doubt whether they are not violating the Constitution is to treat as of no force the most imperative obligations any person can assume. A business agent who would deal in that manner with his principal's business would be treated as untrustworthy; a witness in court who would treat his oath thus lightly and affirm things concerning which he was in doubt would be held a criminal. Indeed, it is because the legislature has applied the judgment of its members to the question of its authority to pass the proposed law, and has only passed it after being satisfied of the authority, that the judiciary waive their own doubts and give it their support.

If a legislator decides to shirk his duty and refrain from considering the constitutionality of any law presented for his consideration, he can easily rid himself of a great responsibility, but his neglect is bound to result in injury to the public. The inevitable result of Congress enacting laws without giving careful consideration to their constitutionality would be to throw upon the Supreme Court the burden of declaring those laws unconstitutional, and inasmuch as the public would have a right to presume Members of Congress had discharged their solemn duty to consider the constitutionality of the laws enacted by them, they will soon come to regard the Supreme Court as an obstruction to all real progress and an enemy to the people, and give comfort and strength to those who have argued in favor of the recall of judges. I do not believe that any Member of this House, who, after giving to a measure the consideration he ought to give it, reaches the conclusion that it is unconstitutional, can excuse his voting for it.

I do not claim any superior knowledge as to the provisions of the Constitution nor any superior ability to interpret it, but from a most careful study of this question I am convinced that there is in the Constitution no power under which Congress can enact this bill into law, and I am, therefore, opposed to it. No matter what title may be placed on a bill, its purpose is to be ascertained from its provisions, and there is not one among the proponents of this bill who would dare to assert that it has any purpose other than to regulate the hours and ages of employees engaged in the manufacturing industries of the country. There is not one of them who will assert that Congress has any right to enact a bill directly regulating the hours of labor and the ages of employees, but this they seek to accomplish by prohibiting the shipment in interstate commerce of commodities manufactured under conditions of which they do not approve, basing their authority for this legislation upon the commerce clause of the Constitution. No advocate of this bill has ever been able to cite a single decision of the Supreme Court justifying the construction they place upon the commerce clause of the Constitution. In an effort to sustain their contention the majority of the committee reporting this bill referred to an argument by an attorney who cites in support of this legislation the decisions of the Supreme Court in the Lottery cases, Pure Food cases, and White Slave cases.

In the Pure Food cases Congress exercises the power of regulating commerce on the ground that the articles are injurious within themselves. Under the same principle diseased meat is excluded from commerce because it is not a legitimate article of commerce. Again, in the case of Plumley v. Massachusetts (165 Mass., 461), where the State of Massachusetts forbade the introduction of misbranded oleomargarine, Mr. Justice Harlan said:

> No; that is fraud; that is the use of interstate commerce to perpetuate a fraud, and no man has a right to sell a thing under the pretense of its being something else, because it is not a merchantable commodity, obviously.

In the Lottery case, which is relied upon by the proponents of this bill to sustain their contention as to its constitutionality, you had a gambling contract, evil within itself, and which it was necessary to transport in interstate commerce in order to complete the contract. In the State from which the ticket was issued, gambling may be prohibited by law, but no law can prohibit a man from placing a ticket into the hands of an express company for shipment in interstate commerce into another State. The State is powerless to prevent that which is necessary to complete the contract, namely, the delivery of the ticket, and therefore it is powerless to prohibit the evil. But it was necessary to use the facilities of interstate commerce to complete the transaction. An entire different question is presented here. The evil which this legislation seeks to correct is the employment of children in the production of goods in violation of what they believe to be the proper conditions under which children shall work. The evil, if it be an evil, is completed when the goods are completed by the children and has ceased to exist before the goods are offered for transportation and become a subject of interstate commerce.

In the White Slave case, the other case upon which the proponents particularly rely upon to support their contention, it is argued by them that the decision was based upon the right Congress has to enforce what it believes to be the proper standard of public morals by regulating interstate commerce. In the White Slave case the person was transported in interstate commerce for the purpose of engaging in immoral practices in another State, and the agency of interstate commerce was used for the purpose of inflicting immorality upon the people of another State. But surely there is a distinction between the right to deny the instrumentalities of interstate commerce to one who seeks to transport a woman into another State for immoral purposes, and the denial of the facilities of interstate commerce to cotton goods, innocent within themselves and incapable of doing injury to the health or the morals of the people in the State into which they go, solely because of some condition surrounding their production before they were offered for transportation.

As against the cases cited by the proponents of this bill there are many decisions of the Supreme Court specifically declaring that Congress can only exercise jurisdiction over articles after they become the subject of interstate commerce, and that any effort to control them or their production prior to that time is unconstitutional.

In the case of In re Greene (52 Fed., 113), the court stated:

When the commerce begins is determined not by the character of the commodity, nor by the intention of the owner to transfer it to another State for sale, nor by his preparation of it for transportation, but by its actual delivery to a common carrier for transportation or the actual commencement of its transfer to another State. At that time the power and regulating authority of the State ceases and that of Congress attaches. * * * Neither the production or manufacture of articles or commodities which constitute subjects of commerce and which are intended for trade and traffic with citizens of other States, nor the preparation for their transportation from the State where produced or manufactured prior to the commencement of the actual transfer or transmission thereof to another State, constitutes that interstate commerce which comes within the regulating power of Congress.

In the case of Kidd v. Pierson (128 U. S., p. 1), Justice Lamar said:

No distinction is more popular to the common mind or more clearly expressed in economic and political literature than that between manufacture and commerce. Manufacture is transformation—the fashioning of raw material into a change of form for use. The functions of commerce are different.

In the celebrated Knight case the Supreme Court made the statement:

Commerce begins where manufacture ends.

Quoting again from Kidd v. Pierson:

The functions of commerce are different. The buying and selling and transportation incident thereto constitute commerce, and the regulation of commerce in the constitutional sense embraces regulation at least of such transportation. If it be held that the term includes the regulation of all such manufactures as are intended to be subject to commercial transactions in the future, it is impossible to deny that it would also include all productive industries and contemplate the same thing. The result would be that Congress would be invested, to the exclusion of the State, with the power to regulate not only manufactures, but also agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, mining—in short, every kind of human industry. For is there one of them that does not contemplate more or less clearly an interstate or foreign market? Does not the wheat grower of the Northwest or the cotton planter of the South plant, cultivate, and harvest his crop with his eye on the prices at Liverpool, New York, and Chicago? The power being invested in Congress and denied to the State, it would follow as an inevitable result that the duty would devolve upon Congress to regulate all of these delicate, multiform, and vital interests—interests which in their nature are and must be local in all the details of their successful management. The demands of such supervision would require not only uniform legislation generally applicable throughout the United States, but a swarm of statutes only locally applicable and utterly inconsistent. Any movement toward the establishment of rules of production in this vast country, with its many different climates and opportunities, would only be at the sacrifice of the peculiar advantages of the large part of the localities in it, if not of every one of them. On the other hand, any movement toward local detailed and incongruous legislation required by such interpretation would be about the widest possible departure from the declared objects of the clause in question.

A study of the cases decided by the Supreme Court construing the commerce clause of the Constitution will show that the Supreme Court has never sustained the right to exclude from interstate commerce a merchantable and pure commodity. That this power has always been exercised to exclude from interstate commerce articles injurious within themselves or injurious to those who receive them through the facilities of interstate commerce.

This view has always been entertained by this Congress. In 1907, when a bill similar to this was introduced by Senator Beveridge, a resolution was adopted by this House instructing the Judiciary Committee to investigate and report as to the authority of Congress to legislate over the subject of child labor. The chief law committee of the House, after careful consideration of the subject thus submitted to it, made a unanimous report, in which it was said:

The jurisdiction and authority of woman and child labor certainly falls under the police power of the States, and not under the commercial power of Congress. The suggestion contained in the resolution shows how rapidly we are drifting in thought from our constitutional moorings. Undoubtedly it is the earnest wish of all who desire the prosperity of the Nation that the proper line should always be drawn between the power of the States and the power of the Nation. Certainly there is no warrant in the Constitution for the thought or suggestion that Congress can exercise jurisdiction and authority over the subject of woman and child labor. If those performing such labor are abused and conditions are such that the same should be improved it rests for the State to act. The failure of the States to act will not justify unconstitutional action by Congress.

Unquestionably Congress has the power to investigate conditions, ascertain facts, and report upon any subject. In the opinion of your committee, there is no question as to the entire want of power on the part of Congress to exercise jurisdiction and authority over the subject of woman and child labor.

In fact, it is not a debatable question. It would be a reflection upon the intelligence of Congress to so legislate. It would be casting an unwelcome burden upon the Supreme Court to legislate. The agitation of such legislation produces an uneasy feeling among the people and confuses the average mind as to the power of Congress and as to the power of the States. "The lives, health, and property of the women and children engaged in labor is exclusively within the power of the States, originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to Congress." Such is the emphatic language of the Supreme Court. If a question of good order and morals, it is the same. The argument has long since been made by others, and the committee can not add to it. The assertion of such power by Congress would destroy every vestige of State authority, obliterate State lines, nullify the great work of the framers of the Constitution, and leave the State governments mere matters of form, devoid of power, and ought to more than satisfy the fondest dreams of those favoring centralization of power.

It is said that the provisions of this proposed law are copied from the labor laws of Massachusetts. The Republicans of Massachusetts believe in the national child-labor law, and so declared in the platform adopted by them in their State convention last fall. But though Massachusetts has never been charged with being overzealous as to the maintenance of the rights of a State, and the Republican Party has not boasted of this as one of its principles, yet we find that in their platform they express their realization of the fact that Congress has no power under the Constitution as it now exists to enact a law regulating either the hours of labor or employment of women and children, and they therefore solemnly declared in their platform:

We believe the Federal Constitution should be amended and necessary legislation enacted to secure a national corporation law, national regulation of the hours of labor and the employment of women and children, and national divorce laws. Employers of other States should accord the same privileges and protection to their employees and assume the same duties as their competing employers in Massachusetts.

Upon that platform former Representative McCall was elected governor; and, from what I know of him as a legislator, I do not believe that he would have approved of a platform that declared for national legislation on the subjects mentioned without first amending the Constitution. In view of their solemn declaration in favor of the amendment of the Constitution in order to secure this law, I am anxious to know what attitude the Republican Members of the House from the State of Massachusetts, elected upon this platform, will assume toward this legislation.

In this connection it is seen that in Massachusetts it is realized that Congress has no more right to regulate labor conditions in the States than it has to regulate the divorce laws of the States. The divorce evil is a national one; and if Congress has the power to regulate the evil of child labor within the States, it also has the right to regulate the divorce evil within the States. South Carolina is the only State in the Union having no divorce law. Because of the existence of this national evil, has Congress the power to say, for the protection of the people of South Carolina, who do not believe in the granting of divorces, that no person can be transported in interstate commerce who has been divorced or who has been divorced upon some ground not recognized as legal in the majority of the States of the Union?

Having quoted from the Republican platform of Massachusetts, may I not quote from the platform of the last national convention of the Democratic Party the following:

We denounce as usurpation the efforts of our opponents to deprive the States of any of the rights reserved to them and to enlarge and to magnify by indirection the power of the Federal Government.

But even it be admitted that this bill is constitutional, is it wise to establish this precedent? Will it not open the door for legislation seeking to establish uniform conditions in all the industries of the country? In fact, one of the arguments made in favor of this bill is that the manufacturing industries of one State should not be allowed to use the labor of children under 14 because it is cheaper, and therefore unfair competition. If this logic is to be accepted, it means that Congress is to endeavor to establish uniform conditions in the production of goods, something that is absolutely impossible because of the varying conditions existing in the different sections of the country. But if Congress is to attempt it, it would not stop merely at the labor of children, for there its work would but commence. It would go on and do that which is argued in the Republican platform in Massachusetts, namely, provide uniform hours of labor for all the industries of the country; a minimum wage for all workers in like occupations in the country; regulate the freight rates so as to equalize them in all sections, and, to make it entirely uniform, provide also for uniform climatic conditions. If Congress can deny cotton goods the facilities of commerce because of some conditions surrounding their production, then it can regulate all. Congress could say that goods can not be shipped in interstate commerce if in the mill in which they are manufactured there is any segregation of the races or discrimination against any race.

Again, will we not have in the next Congress an effort to amend it so as to cause it to apply to the cultivation as well as to the manufacture of products? That this is not farfetched is evident from the hearings before the committee in the last Congress when Miss Lathrop, the head of the Children's Bureau, informed the committee that children were exploited upon the farms of the South as well as in the mills.

If you believe the bill constitutional and believe also that it would establish no dangerous precedent, can you yet say that the evil is one demanding Federal legislation? The majority report shows the great progress made during the last 10 years by all the States in the improvement of labor laws regulating the employment of children. Is it not wiser to allow the States to continue their progress instead of taking from them this right they have always exercised of regulating labor conditions?

Legislation is of value only in proportion to the information of conditions upon which it is based and the intelligence applied to those conditions in framing legislation. What does the Representative from Maine or Minnesota know of the labor conditions in South Carolina? The enactment of this law would make it necessary for every Member to acquaint himself with conditions in every State in the country if he is to intelligently legislate as to local matters in other States.

I am not in favor of the oppression of children. In my own State, in the only speech I have made on the subject, I declared my belief that South Carolina should increase the age limit from 12 to 14, and in the legislature now in session such a bill is pending. If it is not passed at this session, it will be at some future session. I do not favor, however, the adoption even by the State legislature of the provision limiting the hours of labor of children between 14 and 16 to 8 hours a day, because I know that the mills could not work part of their force 8 hours and another part for 10 hours a day, and the result would be that every child under 16 would be put out of a job. This may mean nothing to gentlemen who have never known poverty, but to the widow whose son of 15 is her only support, the fact that that son loses his means of making a support for himself and for her is quite a serious matter. Why, if that provision had extended to law offices when I was a boy of 15 I would have been prevented from working, because I worked not 8 but often 10 and 12 hours a day, and my employment was absolutely necessary. I believe the progress in this matter should be gradual and there should be no immediate increase from 12 to 16 years.

From whom does the demand for this legislation come? Though I know the great majority of the operatives in the cotton mills in my county I have never had one of them urge me to support it. I have received a petition against its passage and seen many petitions from cotton-mill operatives in the State. There is no such thing as coercing our cotton-mill operatives into opposing something they want. If any boss attempted to influence the operatives in my county in a matter of that kind, they would not hesitate to tell me about it. The truth is that in South Carolina the operatives constitute 38 per cent of the voting population and hold the balance of power in the State. Whenever they want a change in the child-labor law and so inform the Legislature of South Carolina, the legislature will grant it because of their political power. They know their power, and I believe their lack of interest in this legislation is due to the fact that they are unwilling to transfer the right to regulate labor from the State legislature, whose membership is acquainted with local conditions, to Congress, whose membership know nothing of local conditions.

If I believed this legislation was to the best interest of the cotton-mill operatives of the South, I would vote for it, because they have always been my friends. But I believe it against their interest. I believe it will cause many boys of 15 to be thrown out of employment and, in the absence of any law compelling them to go to school, force them to loaf upon the streets and grow up in ignorance of any trade and with no education other than the undesirable one received by the average boy who becomes a loafer. And the worst feature of it is that the Government that assumes this power to legislate in such manner as will, in my opinion, force a boy of 15 out of employment can and will make no provision for his education or for the support of a mother or younger brothers and sisters in cases where they are dependent upon the boy's labor for support.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, how do we stand in the matter of time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado has 30 minutes and the opposition has 35 minutes.

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes of my time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRITT].

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Chairman, I am constrained to vote against this bill, and yet I have anxiously sought to bring myself to its support, for I am the friend of every man and woman and child that toils, and all my life long have I made common battle with them for higher wages, shorter hours, safer working berths, more sanitary surroundings, and better general conditions. But in all reform legislation two things are fundamentally necessary—first, the power to act; and, second, the pursuit of a wise policy.

In my sincere judgment, this bill is not only utterly without constitutional warrant, but I believe it would signally fail of any helpful results to the working children of the country. I have pondered every line of it over and over again, with the result that I always come back to the two same irresistible conclusions, namely, that this Congress is without constitutional authority to pass it, and that the purposes of its distinguished author, high and patriotic as I know them to be, can only be lawfully accomplished by the proper exercise of legislative powers reserved by the Constitution to the several States. It is our duty here to take into account the constitutional validity of legislation, and not recklessly pass bills of doubtful authority and refer them to the courts for decision. For myself, if I should vote for this bill, with my oath of office still warm on my lips, I should not only do violence to my conscience, but I should recklessly disregard what I understand to be the limitations which the Constitution has imposed upon this Congress.

I am not the special guardian of State rights. I am not only a Republican, I am a good deal of a Hamiltonian. And yet, with all my liberal views toward the Federal powers, I am constrained to say that if a horde of United States officers, armed with unlimited authority, on the Government pay rolls, can go into the heart of my State, enter one of our factories, take charge of its products, and, possessed of every power of inquiry, demand to know by whom these products were made, how old were the makers, whether they were male or female, and arbitrarily say whether such articles should or should not be removed, then the States will have disappeared overnight, and all hope of preserving the historical balance between the States and the Nation will have vanished like an evanescent dream. [Applause.]

But, pray, do not misunderstand me. I heartily favor just and proper child-labor laws. But the States are the only competent authority to make them. The conditions are strikingly diverse in the several States and even in different parts of the same State. No general law can possibly be made to apply to all the various conditions. The kinds of work are different, the customs of the people are unlike, the situation is always a local one, and it is the peculiar province of the States to provide for it.

In my district there are nearly a score of great cotton mills in which thousands of men, women, and children are employed. These mills are owned and operated by big-hearted and generous men, and the relations between them and their employees are excellent, and hundreds of these workers have petitioned me to vote against this bill. Here the employers have provided for their employees free Young Men's Christian Association halls, assembly rooms, music bands, and, in some instances, schools for their children, and our State laws prohibit the employment of children so as not to prevent them from attending the public schools.

The law of life for the child is combined work, study, and play, and the chief of these is work, for, if rightly planned and properly conducted, it can be made to combine the other two. And, too, the surroundings should be clean, moral, and sanitary. But no child is ever injured by reasonable work, under proper conditions. Work is the first law of our being. The child should be taught to know it, to respect it, to do it.

I thank God that I was compelled to go to work when I was but 9 years old. It was rather tough on the boy, but it was the lot of thousands of our southern boys whose early childhood marked the period when the South was emerging from the wreck and desolation of the great war. That experience I prize as my best life lesson, for it, more than anything else, has enabled me to see and to know and to feel the rights and duties of both myself and others.

Mr. Chairman, with all my heart and with all my soul I favor conserving, protecting, and safe-guarding the child, but once more let me say that it ought to be done by the States, for they and they only can do it effectually and without disturbing that happy balance between the States and the Nation upon which our Government with all its untold blessings has rested for more than six score years. [Applause.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I would like to yield to myself six minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HARRISON). The gentleman from Colorado is recognized for six minutes.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, the pending legislation strikes at a great evil—the employment of children in mines, quarries, factories, mills, and canneries—and it seeks to exclude such products from the channels of interstate commerce.

If this bill is passed, the effect will be to make the Federal Government say to the various States, "If you see fit, within your own borders you may tolerate this immoral, this pestilential thing, child labor; but you shall not spread the contagion." [Applause.]

Gentlemen tell you that we are trying to regulate the method of production within the States. No such thing is sought by this bill. North Carolina may continue, if it sees fit, to weave the bodies and souls of its children into the cloth produced in its cotton mills, but it can not exchange that cloth for the gold of citizens in other States that have more consideration for their little ones. [Applause.]

North Carolina does not want this legislation. The supporters of child labor, the men who are profiting from child labor, do not want this legislation. Why? Because it will be effective legislation. They do not want this bill, because they realize that this bill has teeth in it, and that when it is placed on the statute books child labor will end in North Carolina and every other State of the Union.

I want to congratulate my friend from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, that he has swept aside that false pretense that this bill is aimed at the South. We have had Members talking that way for weeks, saying that we were striking at the industries of the South. We are not. We are striking at every man in the United States who seeks to make money out of the employment of child labor. [Applause.]

But, my friends, there is a particular reason why North Carolina is opposed to this bill. During the hearings had before the Committee on Labor and the child-labor subcommittee the cotton-mill manufacturers placed a number of witnesses on the stand, and their star witness was Mr. David Clark, editor of the Southern Textile Bulletin, of Charlotte, N. C. We asked him if they had any factory inspection in North Carolina, and he said they had not. We asked him why they had no factory inspection, and Mr. Clark, the spokesman of these cotton manufacturers, their star witness, said:

> The gentlemen here to-day, the cotton-mill owners, do not favor it. Some people favor Government inspection and some do not. Personally I do not, because it is largely a grafting proposition.

Mr. LONDON, the gentleman from New York, then asked him—

> What do you mean by a grafting proposition?
> Mr. CLARK. I am not prepared to give you the facts, but my understanding is that if you pay you get a clean bill of health.
> Mr. LONDON. You believe your mill owners would resort to corruption in order to escape a fair inspection?
> Mr. CLARK. Not more than any others; not more than was necessary.

That is why they are opposed to this. They may be able to dodge State inspection. They may be able to prevent the enactment of State inspection. But they know, gentlemen, that if this bill is placed on the statute books there will be Federal inspection, and that the little children will come out of the mills in North Carolina and out of every other manufacturing establishment in the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I only wish I had the time to continue, but so many Members on the floor are anxious to discuss this bill that I shall not take up further time, but will ask the consent of the House to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WATSON] is recognized.

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes of my time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, to my mind the saddest tragedy connected with the human race is poverty. It is one of the most universal things that we come in contact with in human life. It is as widespread as humanity, and it will last, if we believe Holy Writ, as long as time lasts. And yet one of the things growing out of poverty that has been, in my judgment, of the greatest value to the human race is the absolute necessity of toil.

I have been impressed this morning in listening to gentlemen discussing this question, with the remarks of the chairman of the committee reporting this bill, Mr. LEWIS, of Maryland, in advocating the legislation that is contained in it. He stood in this presence and made the declaration that he—robust in body, robust in intellect beyond the average of men—began his life of toil in a mine when 9 years of age.

I am not here to defend the working of small children. I am not here to say that I favor the placing of onerous burdens upon the weak and the young. But I am here representing in part a State in this Union that has not seen fit to place a premium upon idleness by passing laws that would prohibit from performing labor all children under 14 years of age. I do not say that I personally would not favor—and I do favor and I have advocated in my own State—legislation that would make the minimum age for labor in certain employments 14 years, as is provided by this bill. But I undertake to say that no State in the Union, however drastic may be the law against child labor, but makes provision in that law for unusual and exceptional cases. This legislation is as hard and fast and as fixed as the laws of the Medes and Persians. If applied in the District of Columbia half of the newsboys would be deprived of earning the small sum that bridges the gulf between hunger and misery and a full stomach and happiness, coupled with the hope of future independence. In one county of my congressional district there are hundreds of small, portable canneries utilizing the blackberry crop, in most instances, if not universally, operated by the mother of the family and her children, bringing to the family revenue in each individual case an amount small of itself but in the aggregate thousands of dollars. The proponents of this legislation would deprive the family of the services of the 12-year-old boy or the 13-year-old girl, and deprive them of the opportunity to contribute their mite to the betterment of the family or deny them the market for their product outside the State. These are, unquestionably, canneries within the meaning of the bill.

I am not a lawyer. I am not here to argue the questions of law involved in this bill. I leave that to gentlemen who are learned in the law. But I do make bold to make the declaration that if any man, lawyer or layman, who possesses a knowledge of the English language and the construction of the courts in the past, will take the able minority report that has been filed by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, Judge WATSON, and his colleagues and read it this bill would be defeated by an overwhelming majority in this House. Being a layman I have some respect for the opinion of courts and great lawyers, believing with Judge Cooley that—

> Legislators have their authority measured by the Constitution. They are chosen to do what it permits, and nothing more, and they take solemn oaths to obey and support it. When they disregard its provisions they usurp authority, abuse their trust, and violate the promise they have confirmed by an oath. To pass an act when they are in doubt whether it is not violating the Constitution is to treat as of no force the most imperative obligations any person can assume. A business agent who would deal in that manner with his principal's business would be treated as untrustworthy; a witness in court who would treat his oath thus lightly and affirm things concerning which he was in doubt would be held a criminal. Indeed, it is because the legislature has applied the judgment of its members to the question of its authority to pass the proposed law, and has only passed it after being satisfied of the authority, that the judiciary waive their own doubts and give it their support.

Having regard for my oath of office, I prefer the opinion of the 18 eminent lawyers who composed the Judiciary Committee of this House during the Fifty-ninth Congress, to whom this precise question was submitted by resolution of the House. This committee, composed of great lawyers, after reviewing all the authorities upon this, a question of law, said:

> The jurisdiction and authority over the subject of woman and child labor certainly falls under the police power of the States and not under the commercial power of Congress. The suggestion contained in the resolution shows how rapidly we are drifting in thought from our constitutional moorings. Undoubtedly it is the earnest wish of all who desire the prosperity of the Nation that the proper line should always be drawn between the power of the States and the power of the Nation. Certainly there is no warrant in the Constitution for the thought or suggestion that Congress can exercise jurisdiction and authority over the subject of woman and child labor. If those performing such labor are abused, and conditions are such that the same should be improved, it rests for the State to act. The failure of the States to act will not justify unconstitutional action by Congress.

Unquestionably Congress has the power to investigate conditions, ascertain facts, and report upon any subject. In the opinion of your committee there is no question as to the entire want of power on the part of Congress to exercise jurisdiction and authority over the subject of woman and child labor.

In fact, it is not a debatable question. It would be a reflection upon the intelligence of Congress to so legislate. It would be casting an unwelcome burden upon the Supreme Court to so legislate. The agitation of such legislation produces an uneasy feeling among the people and confuses the average mind as to the power of Congress and the power of the States. "The lives, health, and property of the women and children engaged in labor is exclusively within the power of the States, originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to Congress." Such is the emphatic language of the Supreme Court. If a question of good order and morals, it is the same. The argument has long since been made by others, and the committee can not add to it. The assertion of such power by Congress would destroy every vestige of State authority, obliterate State lines, nullify the great work of the framers of the Constitution, and leave the State governments mere matters of form, devoid of power, and ought to more than satisfy the fondest dreams of those favoring centralization of power.

I prefer to follow the judgment of such men as John J. Jenkins, then chairman of the Judiciary Committee; RICHARD WAYNE PARKER, still a distinguished Member of this body; Charles E. Littlefield; David A. De Armond; William G. Brantley; and the others who made the above report, than that of the members of the Committee on Labor of the present Congress, who reported and are urging the passage of the bill now under consideration.

I prefer to accept the opinion of that eminent jurist, ex-President William Howard Taft, who in a recent law lecture said:

Bills have been urged upon Congress to forbid interstate commerce in goods made by child labor. Such proposed legislation has failed chiefly because it was thought beyond the Federal power. The distinction between the power exercised in enacting the pure-food bill and that which would have been necessary in the case of the child-labor bill is that Congress in the former is only preventing interstate commerce from being a vehicle for conveyance of something which would be injurious to people at its destination, and it might properly decline to permit the use of interstate commerce for that detrimental result. In the latter case Congress would be using its regulative power of interstate commerce not to effect any result of interstate commerce. Articles made by child labor are presumably as good and useful as articles made by adults. The proposed law is to be enforced to discourage the making of articles by child labor in the State from which the articles were shipped. In other words, it seeks indirectly and by duress to compel the States to pass a certain kind of legislation that is completely within their discretion to enact or not. Child labor in the State of the shipment has no legitimate or germane relation to the interstate commerce of which the goods thus made are to form a part, to its character, or to its effect. Such an attempt of Congress to use its power of regulating such commerce to suppress the use of child labor in the State of shipment would be a clear usurpation of that State's rights. (Popular Government, pp. 142, 143.)

The great trouble in legislating and in passing legislation here—one of the great troubles of which we are all, I will not say guilty, but forced to yield to by circumstances—is our engagement with matters specially committed to us. We do not have time to investigate everything, and we therefore follow the committees. Without any reflection upon anybody, I assert that because of lack of time probably not one-fifth of the membership have taken the time to investigate the legal questions that are involved in this legislation.

Gentlemen, we have gone far in a very few years in the direction of State socialism. As my colleague [Mr. WEBB] stated here this morning, only eight years ago this question was submitted to the Judiciary Committee of this House, which brought in a unanimous report—and there are gentlemen who are still Members of this House who participated in the making of that report—in which they denied the right of Congress to regulate the hours of labor and the age of laborers within a State. We are going at a very rapid rate. My mind goes back to the past. In the section of country in which I lived in my childhood, just after the Civil War, the poverty was very much greater than it is now and the necessity for labor was greater. I know the conditions that existed then. As my mind runs back I am amazed that this country of ours should have spent its millions of gold and its thousands of human lives in a devastating war, from which the section of our country from which I come has taken half a century to begin to recover. I am amazed that it should have settled the question of slavery by blood, by war, and by death, when, if this legislation is within the power of the Congress of the United States, a simple legislative act, merely saying that no product produced by slave labor should enter into interstate commerce, would have settled the question and have freed every slave in America. Not a drop of blood need have been shed if this legislation is possible to-day under our laws.

Mr. Chairman, this is the culmination of an agitation that has gone on for a number of years. I venture the assertion that in all the spasm of muckraking and misrepresentation that has been carried on by sundry organizations and publications during the past 10 years, no greater slanders or misrepresentations have been made of any people on earth, with the possible exception of the population of the southern mountain section, than of the cotton-mill operatives of the South, particularly of those in the States of North and South Carolina. These false and misleading statements have been in some instances made by people who never saw a southern cotton mill, and therefore knew absolutely nothing about it, or by paid emissaries whose salary depended upon making a case. We have had lobby investigations relating to other legislation that has been pending in Congress and investigations as to the means that were used by the paid representatives of interested parties to bring about certain results. I do not charge that these influences have reached any men upon this floor, but I do say that there are gentlemen within the sound of my voice who, if this legislation should become a law, would have to go back to the earning of an honest living, and at a very much less wage than they are getting out of this agitation, or receive appointment from the Department of Labor as an inspector to enforce its provisions. It is that agitation which has brought this before the American Congress. My friend the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] stands here and speaks of my State weaving into its cloth the lives and blood and morals of its children. I say to him and I say to the membership of this House that there is no higher standard of morals or Americanism on this continent than there is in North Carolina. [Applause.] I invite him or any other Member of this House to go to the village in which I live, where there is a cotton mill operating—I ask him to go and view those conditions, the conditions of those children who by compulsion are in the schools nine months in the year, and to view the condition of sanitation——

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. No; I have not the time. I invite gentlemen to view the conditions of labor and every other condition contributing to the making of men and women out of these children, and compare those conditions with those which exist at any place in his own State, and I will stand the comparison, even by his own judgment.

Mr. Chairman, there is more sentimentality than there is sense in the proposition to legislate in this way. [Applause.] I repeat again that if the membership of this House, distinguished gentlemen as all of them are, with their hearts in the proper place—and the great trouble is that their hearts have been appealed to until their judgment in many instances is biased—if they will take the facts as they can see them at first hand, they will be convinced of the correctness of what I say. This great committee was invited to go into the cotton-mill districts of the South, not at their own expense or at the expense of the contingent fund of the House, but at the expense of gentlemen who wanted to teach them something—they were invited to go and see for themselves whether or not we were weaving into the cloth made in our State the blood and the morals and the lives of little children, and they did not go. They seem not to want to know the truth. If they had gone, they would have been personally convinced. If we are ready to embark upon State socialism, then pass this legislation. If you are ready, gentlemen on that side and on this side, that the strong arm of the Federal Government may take over the activities of all the people in your States and to disband your State legislatures and your own internal governments, then you have the opportunity, by voting for this bill. To escape the sentence pronounced upon the first offending couple: "In the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat bread," the race has labored for 6,000 years. Few have escaped, and upon the mass of men the curse (?) will rest until the end of time. To escape it entirely would be destructive, for it is still true that "an idle brain is the devil's workshop," to which might be appropriately added, "and idle hands are his instruments of evil." The danger of degeneracy, mental, moral, and physical, comes from the idle and not from those who toil.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the eulogy pronounced on labor by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] appeals to us all, but he fails to make the sharp distinction between working and being worked. [Applause.] We do not object to children working, but we do object to their being worked. We object not to the discipline of work, but we do object to its profit when at the expense of the country's childhood. This bill is trying to take care of the childhood of the country; and if there is any element that should win legislation here of a favorable character, it is that which relates to our children. Legislation should not be confined, as I see it, to the material elements of the Nation, but it should extend to the very soul of its greatest treasure, the source of the real greatness of the land, namely, the childhood of the country. I shall vote for the measure, and hope it will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, how much time is there remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado has 29 minutes, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WATSON] has 19 minutes.

Mr. KEATING. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE].

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I have listened very attentively to the several speeches that have been made for and against this bill. In the brief time that I have been a Member of this House, I have listened to very eloquent speeches on affairs of interest to this great country of ours. We have been treated to speeches on preparedness. We have been told how to raise armies and build navies for the defense of our Nation; but to-day, sir, we are being treated to speeches on the real preparedness of our Nation—the education, the health, and the upbuilding of our children. [Applause.] That to my mind is the real question before this body. The opponents of this bill are discussing the constitutionality of this bill. Mr. Chairman, the question is shall we allow one State or another to do as it pleases with child labor? No, Mr. Chairman, this question is too important to permit even one State, no matter how great it may be, to assume any such responsibility. This is a bill that to my mind treats entirely with the question of the conservation of the health of our children, the future men and women who are to be the rulers of this Nation. [Applause.] Talk about children 12 years of age going into a mill and working 12 and 14 hours a day, and then tell us that they are fit for future citizenship! With their health broken and without education, you opponents know that this is impossible!

Mr. Chairman, I represent, in part, a State, the grand old State of Massachusetts, wherein are more mercantile and manufacturing establishments than in almost any other State of the Union. And we, Mr. Chairman, in the progress of making good laws for the protection of child and woman labor have been met with the same voice that meets you to-day—unscrupulous capitalists trying to commercialize in the blood of innocent children. [Applause.] That, Mr. Chairman, is the issue. It is not so much whether the products of one State with unfair child-labor laws shall be shipped with another State with adequate child-labor laws in another part of the country, but it is whether or not this Nation of ours wants to go on record of permitting any State, no matter where it is, to do the things that are unfair to the rest of the Nation.

The law to protect the labor of children between the ages of 14 and 16, no matter what State it is, has worked equally in the interest of the capitalist as it does for the laborer, because it is giving to him the labor of strong, virile young men and women. It is not right that the conditions that confront us in some of our States in this country to-day should continue.

Let me state to you, if you will, what the real conditions of many of those who have been obliged to work in mills and factories of this Nation in their young days are to-day. Pending before this Congress is a bill for the building of a sanitarium for taking care of the unfortunate people of these United States who are afflicted with that dreaded and terrible disease—tuberculosis. It is known, and the statistics prove it, that there is no people in the land where this disease has been increasing more rapidly than among the people in the factories and mills where children and mothers have been compelled to work 12 hours a day. I do not believe that there is a Member of this body, I care not from what State he comes, who, if he will discuss this bill on its real merits, on the merits that appeal to every man and every Member of this body who has the welfare of the children of our country at heart, but who will say that the United States, through its Congress, will turn a deaf ear to the mothers and children of this Union who are crying out at this moment for relief from this great Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the question of the constitutionality is but a byplay. This opposition, Mr. Chairman, does not come, I contend, from the hearts of the Members of this body who are speaking against it, because if they do know the real conditions they can not defend their position on the idle argument of constitutionality. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, investigations that have taken place throughout this country on the condition of child labor have shown that stringent laws should be put into effect to discontinue the working in the mills and factories of young children unfitted by health, education, and age to do the laborious work that is exacted from them. State after State, realizing that the future of our country must of necessity depend on the health of the children, have passed laws regulating not only the condition as applied to their labor but also to their education. In States where these laws are put into effect they have been met with the strong opposition of the capitalists and mill owners, who believed that we were destroying their rights in labor. Great insistence was placed by the opposition upon the alleged effect that under the law the children can not get the benefit of our eight-hour day but would be discharged entirely. The result would be, said the manufacturers, that the children would spend their time in dangerous and unprofitable idleness and be worse off than when at work 10 hours a day, and that the wholesale hardships among families would be far greater than public relief or private charity could alleviate. The law, nevertheless, has been put into effect and has been successful to the extent that nearly all children who were at work when these laws were enacted are to-day working in the same occupations, and there has been no perceptible increase in family hardships.

In my own State, where this law has been in effect for some years past, we have noticed the rapid advance in the health and education of the children employed in mills, and the law has proven beneficial not only to those employed but to the manufacturers and mill agents themselves, who are to-day the first to come to the defense of laws of this nature.

Investigations of committees throughout this country have disclosed the absolute necessity of the passage of this bill.

Investigation has also clearly shown that in many cases children under the age of 16 and mothers of children were really unfit to perform the arduous work in the mills when compelled to toil 10 hours or more in order to get a mere sustenance to keep life and body together. It was shown in many cases that with the unhealthy condition of many of them made them susceptible to sickness and disease.

It became absolutely necessary that something should be done to immediately assist employees of the mills to bring about a more healthy and beneficial condition, and if we can do nothing else by the passage of this bill but to help in a measure to bring about these conditions it will bring untold blessings and benefits to our Nation.

It is for this reason that I raise my voice in behalf of this bill, for I believe it is the duty of all States to protect the health of their people, and that when they neglect to do so, it is time for the Nation to speak. State laws are good when States are enlightened enough to make them, but when it comes to a pass in this country that States will consider commercialism against the human lives of our men and women, then the Nation must speak through Congress.

Let us further behold that commercial greed and selfish capitalists who would deign to make their riches by the sweat and blood of innocent children shall yield to righteousness in this matter.

Mr. Chairman, I earnestly hope that this bill will become a law without a dissenting voice, so that we can say to the entire world that this Union made free by the shedding of the blood of our forefathers still remains as they intended it should and that that blood was not shed in vain. Let us realize that a nation is only as strong as the health of the people, and let us bring to the minds of our children that the laws of this land are what they were intended to be—the protector of all her people.

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. NICHOLLS].

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended at this session to take up any time of the House, for the reason that I know that there are a great many Members more able and competent to discuss the general proposition than I am. But with reference to the bill before us, I believe that I am in a position to know as much, if not more, about what legislation is necessary than possibly any man within the sound of my voice. For, gentlemen, I have not only seen the operation of the cotton mills from the standpoint of the financier, but it has been my pleasure and my experience to work myself in a cotton mill at the age that you are now trying to exclude. When I was a mere boy at the age of 14 I went into a cotton mill in my native county. That county now has more mills within its borders than any county in the United States, with the exception of one in the State of Massachusetts. I therefore say that I know personally what it means to labor in a cotton mill at the age of 14 years.

But, to go further, with this bill, it seems to me that we ought to ask the question: Who wants and who needs this legislation? You say the man who runs the mill, and I say the men and women and children who labor in the mill do not want it. Why do I make that statement? I have in my office, Mr. Chairman, numerous petitions signed by 6,716 persons, operatives who work from day to day in these cotton mills, petitioning their Congressmen to vote against the passage of such a measure. I am not here representing the men who own the mills in this matter. Any one of my colleagues from my State knows that the men who own the mill endeavored to keep me from coming here, but the people who actually work in the mill sent me here as their representative.

I assure you that if, for an instant, any legislation could be passed benefiting the men who actually labor I would be hand in hand with you in such legislation.

What is their objection? Gentlemen, you who do not know the situation can not imagine, but the objection is simply this: In the State of South Carolina when I was a Member of the House of Representatives from that State we had no child-labor law, but we passed a law limiting the age to 12 years. Later on we passed a law limiting the age to 14 years, with the proviso that a man who really needed the labor of his child could make an affidavit that he needed it, and the child was allowed to work between the ages of 12 and 14. I am not in favor of that legislation, because invariably such an affidavit was made. I am in favor and would vote for your bill if I was a member of the South Carolina Legislature and your bill was before that body, if you would make it that no child under 14 years of age could work in a cotton mill. But when you get above that age you have this to confront you. The mill operatives in the South are not like those in the East or the North. You have a large foreign element who have nothing to live up to, but only come here for the specific purpose of making a living. In the South what have we? The people who build the cotton mills in the South come from the surrounding country where the mills are located, and the men who labor in the mills come from the States of Tennessee, North Carolina, and from the farms in South Carolina. They are absolutely dependent on their daily wage for the support of their families. They have more things to live for than the average foreigner, who comes here and who does not care if he and his family are all crowded in one room; they are true Americans and come from the same flesh and blood that you come from and I come from, and have the same independence of character that we have, and they can not afford to live as a great many of the mill people in Massachusetts and other States live, crowded in tenement houses. As it is, the struggle which they make to support themselves is an honorable, though hard one, and I therefore pray of you that you do not pass any law which would cut down their wages, as this law would. Some of the manufacturers of North Carolina invited the honorable Committee on Labor to inspect mills in the South at the expense of the cotton mills and not at their own, and I am satisfied that if they had taken advantage of this opportunity to visit our mills they would have come back to Washington and reported that conditions are not nearly so bad as they are pictured by some of the leagues over the country, who are behind and who are advocating this bill. I believe that the Members of the House who are pushing it are absolutely conscientious and sincere in the matter. But does it not seem to some of us that some people who are spending their time making reports about the bad conditions in Southern cotton mills would be in a position, if this bill passed, where they would find out that they knew about as little of "real man labor" as they do about "child labor." The State which I have the honor to represent is doing everything in its power, under the circumstances, to make conditions better for the children in its border.

We have a compulsory education law which sends a boy to school from the time he is 7 years old until he is 14. After he reaches that age, Mr. Chairman, the rest of his family actually need his help, actually need his wage, to help support the younger children coming up under him. If a boy is sent to school from the time he is 7 until he is 14, he has a sufficient education, unless he wants to take a profession.

A great many Members of the House have never had seven years' education, and yet, I do not think that any of them would contend that they were not fully qualified to represent the people of their respective districts and to formulate laws for the government of this great Nation.

Mr. Chairman, if this act should pass and become a law, where would we stop? Is there any reason on earth why a bill of a similar nature could not be introduced and passed, requiring that no child in any walk of life should be allowed to work until it was 16 years of age? The law which we are now discussing really does not apply to the negroes of the South, because none of them work in the cotton mills. An experiment was made along this line in Charleston, S. C., but after six months' trial the mill was closed down, moved to Georgia, and white help secured. It has been said that the reason that negroes could not work successfully in the cotton mill was because the hum of the machinery put them to sleep. I can not vouch for this; however, I do know a great majority of the cotton picked in the Southern States is picked by children, both white and black, under the age of 16. If this law should be made to include all classes of children, it would be absolutely impossible to gather this great commodity from the fields in our country.

Mr. Chairman, I have not touched on what seems to me the main objection to the pending bill. I fail to see how any lawyer, who has seen the authorities, could take the position consistently that the bill if passed is constitutional. It is the same old question of State rights, in which I have always believed and in which I shall always believe, regardless of the action of Congress on this measure. It is the same question which confronted Congress before the outbreak of the Civil War, and if able men and able lawyers like President Lincoln and other men of his type, at that time at the head of the Government, had taken the position that Congress had a right to pass a law controlling the State on the question of slavery they would never have engulfed this country in the most horrible struggle that it has ever known. No, indeed, if they had ever entertained the remotest idea that such an act would have been constitutional and if the courts should have held it so this great struggle could have been avoided.

This bill is not at all in the same class as the pure food, the white-slave law, and the lottery measure, which have been passed upon and held constitutional by our Supreme Court. The Supreme Court upheld the passage of the bills above named because the article which was delivered from one State into another was deleterious and after being delivered did great harm, and based their opinion upon the ground that any shipment of a commodity which would hurt the morals of the community could not be carried from one State and placed upon the people of another. In no case has the long and often tortuous line of demarcation between State and Federal control been more clearly drawn than in the celebrated case of Kidd v. Pearson (128 U. S.) wherein the court said:

> No distinction is more popular to the common mind or more clearly expressed in economic and political literature than that between manufacturers and commerce. Manufacture is transformation—the fashioning of raw materials into a change of form for use. The functions of commerce are different. The buying and selling and the transportation incidental thereto constitute commerce, and the regulation of commerce in the constitutional sense embraces the regulation at least of such transportation. The legal definition of the term as given by this court in County of Mobile v. Kimball (102 U. S., 691, 702) is as follows:
> "Commerce with foreign countries and among the States, strictly considered, consists in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation and the transportation and transit of persons and property as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities."
> If it be held that the term includes the regulation of all such manufactures as are intended to be the subject of commercial transactions in the future, it is impossible to deny that it would also include all productive industries that contemplate the same thing. The result would be that Congress would be invested, to the exclusion of the States, with the power to regulate not only manufactures but also agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, mining—in short, every branch of human industry. For is there one of them that does not contemplate more or less clearly an interstate or foreign market? Does not the wheat grower of the Northwest and the cotton planter of the South plant, cultivate, and harvest his crop with an eye on the prices at Liverpool, New York, and Chicago? The power being vested in Congress and denied to the States, it would follow as an inevitable result that the duty would devolve on Congress to regulate all of these delicate, multiform, and vital interests—interests which in their nature are and must be local in all the details of their successful management.
> It is not necessary to enlarge on, but only to suggest the impracticability of such a scheme when we read the multitudinous affairs involved and the almost infinite variety of their minute details.
> It was said by Chief Justice Marshall that it is a matter of public history that the object of vesting in Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States was to insure uniformity of regulation against conflicting and discriminating State legislation. See also County of Mobile v. Kimball (supra, p. 697).
> This being true, how can it further that object so to interpret the constitutional provision as to place upon Congress the obligation to exercise the supervisory powers just indicated? The demands of such a supervision would require not uniform legislation generally applicable throughout the United States, but a swarm of statutes only locally applicable and utterly inconsistent. Any movement toward the establishment of rules of production in this vast country, with its many different climates and opportunities, could only be at the sacrifice of the peculiar advantages of a large part of the localities in it, if not of every one of them. On the other hand, any movement toward the local, detailed, and incongruous legislation required by such interpretation would be about the widest possible departure from the declared object of the clause in question. Nor this alone. Even in the exercise of the power contended for Congress would be confined to the regulation, not of certain branches of industry, however numerous, but to those instances in each and every branch where the producer contemplated an interstate market.
> These instances would be almost infinite, as we have seen, but still there would always remain the possibility and often it would be the case that the producer contemplated a domestic market. In that case the supervisory power must be executed by the State, and the interminable trouble would be presented that whether the one power or the other should exercise the authority in question would be determined, not by any general or intelligible rule, but by the secret and changeable intention of the producer in each and every act of production. A situation more paralyzing to the State governments and more provocative on conflicts between the General Government and the States and less likely to have been what the framers of the Constitution intended it would be difficult to imagine.

There are numerous other authorities which might be cited sustaining this same principle.

In the "Lottery case," which I have referred to, Judge Harlan in his opinion said in substance that traffic which could be limited in interstate commerce from one State to another was the kind of traffic which one could not pursue as a matter of right, the idea being that when the lottery ticket went from one State to another, at the time it reached its destination would cause the violation of morals and other things in that case.

Now, let us take the bill before us. There is not a man on the floor of the House who would for one instant contend that a bale of cotton goods was in any way injurious or could in any way do anyone any harm, and yet we go back to the actual manufacturing of the commodity and try to take hold of that.

You say that you do not punish the manufacturers, but that you punish the common carriers. This is merely a way of doing indirectly what you know you have no right to do directly. It is unquestionably a violation of that clause of the Constitution which guarantees that no citizen can be deprived of his property without due process of law. But you say you are not depriving him of his property; that is the very thing you are doing, because of what value would cotton goods be to the manufacturer or to the purchaser who had purchased them for the purpose of selling them if he had absolutely no way to dispose of them? In other words, while you do not actually propose to take from him his property without due process of law, you do propose, without due process of law, to put him in such a position that his property is absolutely worthless to him because he has no way of selling and delivering same. In the case of People against Hawkins, One hundred and fifty-seventh New York, the court speaks in this language:

> The citizen can not be deprived of his property without due process of law. Any law which annihilates its value, restricts its use, or takes away any of its essential attributes comes within the purview of this limitation or its power.

This is not the first time that the question as to whether or not Congress had a right to legislate against child labor has arisen before this body. A few years ago the Judiciary Committee of this House was asked to make a thorough investigation and research into the law and report back to this House whether or not Congress had that right. The opinion of this able committee was unanimous that this right did not exist and that it was a question for the States to determine.

There are numerous and sundry opinions of the court sustaining this proposition, and some of the most learned lawyers of our country have gone into it to a great extent. Ex-President Taft, who is also an ex-judge and who is considered to be one of our ablest lawyers, has said in his book on Popular Government, pages 142 and 143:

> Bills have been urged upon Congress to forbid interstate commerce in goods made by child labor. Such proposed legislation has failed chiefly because it was thought beyond the Federal power. The distinction between the power exercised in enacting the pure-food bill and that which would have been necessary in the case of the child-labor bill is that Congress in the former is only preventing interstate commerce from being a vehicle for conveyance of something which would be injurious to people at its destination, and it might properly decline to permit the use of interstate commerce for that detrimental result. In the latter case Congress would be using its regulative power of interstate commerce not to effect any result of interstate commerce. Articles made by child labor are presumably as good and useful as articles made by adults. The proposed law is to be enforced to discourage the making of articles by child labor in the State from which the articles were shipped. In other words, it seeks indirectly and by duress to compel the States to pass a certain kind of legislation that is completely within their discretion to enact or not. Child labor in the State of the shipment has no legitimate or germane relation to the interstate commerce of which the goods thus made are to form a part, to its character, or to its effect. Such an attempt of Congress to use its power of regulating such commerce to supress the use of child labor in the State of shipment would be a clear usurpation of that State's rights. (Popular Government, pp. 142–143.)

I would like to talk to you at great length upon this subject, but I realize that there are numbers of other gentlemen here who are very deeply interested in this bill. I believe as time progresses and conditions in the South are improved that each of our States will do everything in their power, as they have done in the past, to relieve the children from working in the mills, but I tell you frankly that if you pass this law and if the Supreme Court of the United States sustains your action, you will take bread out of the mouths of numbers of helpless children who are now depending largely upon their "big brother" or "big sister" to feed them. As I have said before, if this bill was before the South Carolina Legislature—the only body, in my judgment, which has the right to pass it, governing South Carolina—and I were a member of that body, I would vote for its passage, provided that the age limit was 14 years instead of 16. If you decide to pass this bill, I implore you to vote for an amendment which will be introduced making the minimum wage scale in manufacturing plants called for by this bill $2 per day, because if you deprive the families in the mills of the South from the aid now given them by their children from 14 to 16, you should at least place the adult members of these families in a position where they could earn a wage on which their families could live. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, this measure is not any great bugaboo, as the cotton and woolen mill districts and mining districts seem to indicate here. The Constitution of the United States is not going to be trampled under foot. It is just a question of whether you are going to conserve the young boys and girls of the country or put them into these mines and factories, and grind their sweat and blood into dollars. The issue is clearly drawn. Where is the man who wants the little boy or little girl under 14 years of age to be confined in the cotton mills of his country, where they will inhale and absorb into their lungs all of the lint and dust and all of the conditions of immorality that surround them and cause them finally to degenerate into a race of pigmies, physically and mentally?

Mr. GORDON rose.

Mr. QUIN. I have not the time to yield. The question is whether or not we want to make a strong virile race of men and women in this country. You can not do it by putting little children into factories and mines at hard labor. You can not bring up that race that the American people have been so proud of in the past, if we are going to take them when they are little boys and girls and put them to work in mines beneath the earth to inhale dust and gases, and in cotton and wool factories to inhale dust and lint. We can not change nature. We know that in the tender years of life the child should have its schooling, it should have its outdoor exercise in God's pure air and sunshine. If we want to make a race of strong men and women we must have conditions that will protect them. [Applause.] I believe this Congress ought to conserve the manhood and womanhood of this Republic, and it is our duty under the oath taken here to look out for the human race instead of piling up dollars for the men who own the factories and the mines. [Applause.] We know that that class of men have been in all the States endeavoring to keep the respective legislators from passing wholesome laws to protect the children, and when we come to the Federal Congress we see that the same influence is at work here. They never stop; they work all of the time.

The distinguished gentleman from North Carolina talked about a lobby. I hope to God there is a set of people in this Republic who are so interested that they will voluntarily give up their time to come to the city of Washington and try to get a law passed that will save the little boys and girls from being made mental and physical dwarfs and their beauty and health from being undermined by being ground into almighty dollars by the capitalists of this country. [Applause.]

Some of the gentlemen who have just spoken seem to be very solicitous about the success of the factories of our country. I am just as good a wisher for the success and prosperity of the factories as any other man in this Congress, but I shall never cast my vote against the poor laboring people of my district, State, and Nation. I know that the poor people are bound to work for a living, but I do not propose to sit idly by and see these poor little boys and girls worked in these factories and mines when they should be attending public schools to fit them for citizenship and a fair chance in life.

As Representatives of the people we should endeavor to give every boy and girl in this great Republic an opportunity to make good in the world. Does any man on this floor believe the factory and mine owners are as much interested in the little children in their factories and mines as they are in the profits they can make out of this class of labor?

It is our duty to protect the poor children instead of allowing them to be the profit makers for the capitalists of this country.

The gentlemen who are so afraid that capital will be driven out of the manufacturing and mining business are unduly excited. It is my observation that capital can always take care of itself. This bill puts all of the factories and mines in all of the States of the Union on an equal footing. Why should any of them complain?

I contend no child under 16 years of age should be allowed to work in the factories and mines of our country. The child can not help itself. Then it is the duty of the lawmakers of this Government to make it impossible for the children to be worked in those places at a low, measly rate of wages which shuts the door of opportunity in their faces the remainder of their lives.

The gentleman from North Carolina said this child-labor bill is founded on sentiment, and that seems to be one of his reasons for opposing the measure. Blessed be the people if they are fortunate enough to have this noble sentiment enacted into the law of this land.

Mr. Chairman, I am proud of the fact that sentiment has found its way into the legislative halls of this Nation to force the lawmakers to recognize the poor children of the United States and enact this wholesome law for their welfare. God bless the sentiment which takes the poor, unfortunate children of the laboring people out of the toils of the captains of industry and places them in the schools to train them for the duties of citizenship. The glory of this Republic depends upon its citizenry. If these little girls spend 8 or 10 hours every day except Sunday at work in factories, what kind of mothers would they make after they are grown women? A large percentage of them would have their health undermined in their youth. They could not have the advantages of schools. They would enter woman's estate with heavy handicaps. Each succeeding generation would become weaker.

Who doubts nature's law of heredity? What prospect for the future has the boy who spends his tender years working in cotton or woolen factories or in the bowels of the earth mining coal or anything else?

Every sensible man knows that boy is loaded down with a heavy weight.

Who says protect the poor children from these hardships and handicaps? Motherhood, humanity, sentiment, and God.

Who says kill this bill? The American capitalist; in order that he might further increase his profits and fortune.

One distinguished speaker on this floor says this bill ought to be killed because it is State socialism.

Mr. Chairman, it is my observation that every bill for the real benefit of the people has to run the gauntlet of its opponents, who claim it either unconstitutional or socialistic.

We all take the oath to support the Constitution. I do not think I ever voted for any measure that violated the Constitution. From my own intellect and conscience I interpret the Constitution as touching the bill now under discussion. The corporations of this country shall never interpret the Constitution for me, and I know they can never get my conscience.

All of this hurrah about State socialism has no terrors for me. I am for this bill in soul, heart, and mind, and hope it will pass this House before the sun sets this day. [Applause.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, it is very easy for a man from the State of Massachusetts to be in favor of this bill. I do not rise for the purpose of saying that I am in favor of it. Of course I am in favor of it. I claim no especial virtue for my views. We prohibit child labor in Massachusetts and so it is clearly to our interest to prohibit child labor in States which compete with us. The majority report, I think, gives too much credit to former Senator Beveridge. To be sure he was one of those who followed President Roosevelt's lead, but, if I recollect rightly, one year earlier Congressman William S. McNary, of my own State of Massachusetts, was the first Member of Congress to introduce a measure looking to the ultimate elimination of child labor throughout the land. At that time Congressman McNary and I, each of us, introduced bills to make effective President Roosevelt's recommendation contained in his message to Congress on December 6, 1904.

The President expressed a belief that the States themselves must ultimately settle the question, and called for an investigation. At that time it is probable that the courts would have held this present proposed law to be unconstitutional.

Along in January, 1907, Senator Beveridge offered his amendment seeking to destroy child labor by legislation, which, as he claimed, was constitutional under the "commerce clause" of the Constitution. At the time the trend of the decisions of the Supreme Court had been such as to make it quite apparent to good lawyers that the Beveridge amendment would not be upheld. Since that day the trend of decisions has changed and I feel little apprehension that this proposed measure should be declared unconstitutional. I am heartily in favor of this child-labor bill. I believe that it will go far to prohibiting child labor, and I believe that the courts will find it constitutional; therefore I shall vote for the bill.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY].

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I can get started in three minutes. I want to say a few things, however, that occurred to me with reference to this bill, and I have not had time to look through it, either. As I understand, it provides that the products from factories using a certain character of labor shall not be transported across State lines. My objection to that is that I believe in the people of the different localities of this country controlling, in matters of local concern, their own affairs. I have as much confidence in the people of South Carolina doing justice to their children and rightly determining what they ought to have in their factories as I have in the people of Colorado. I am perfectly willing for Colorado to determine what character of labor her factories shall have. I would not say one word nationally with reference to it. I am perfectly willing for the State of Massachusetts to determine what character of labor she will use in her factories, but I have just as much confidence in the intelligence and integrity and in the humanity of the people of Georgia as I have in the people of Arizona or the people of California. I do not think that we ought to tear down every principle of democracy which relegates to the people the right to determine for themselves the things they have the power to overlook. If I did not believe in the ability of the people to control their own affairs and to govern themselves, I would then say we here in Washington should determine it for them, but believing in the ability of the people to control their own local affairs, to pass their own local laws relative to their factories and their own children, I know that they are better able to do that the closer you bring it home to them. Believing in their ability to do that, and knowing the closer you bring the subject to them the more able they are to deal with it intelligently, and having the same confidence in the people of one State that I have in the people of another, I can not from the city of Washington say to the people of Georgia what they shall do, nor to the people of South Carolina, nor to the people of Alabama, and I do not want them to say to the people of my State, and I do not believe that it is the province of a democratic representative government for the Congress sitting in Washington to determine for every State in the Union what it shall do in respect to its local affairs. [Applause.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the only debatable question, in my judgment, before the committee is the constitutionality of this measure. Now, I, of course, could not in the space of eight minutes hope to discuss with any satisfaction either to myself or to the committee the question of its constitutionality. And I will therefore not attempt to do any more than merely to outline the grounds upon which I believe it is within our constitutional power to enact. I am surprised that the opponents of this legislation, as they have gone on with their debate this morning, have not seen the proposition that is really before the House. It is simply this: We have the power under the Constitution to regulate interstate commerce. Now, is there any limit to our power? Is our power arbitrary? I am frank to say I do not believe it is.

It is, I believe, limited and measured in exactly the same degree that the police power of a State is measured and limited with reference to its own legislation. So, then, coming down to the particular proposition, the question arises, Would the State of South Carolina or the State of Virginia or Georgia, or any State, have the power to enact this legislation controlling these commodities and these manufactures within their own State for their own purpose? Not one of the opponents of this bill will deny that the States have that power; and, if they have it, then we have the same power, to the same extent, to apply the same principles and for the same purposes in so far as interstate commerce is concerned. And that is all that is attempted. Now, the minority have presented a very able brief, and it should, because of the distinguished ability of the men who sign it, command the careful attention of the House; but I want to say, and without any criticism upon those gentlemen, that anyone who reads this minority report must conclude that they are appearing here as advocates of the opponents of this legislation rather than in a judicial frame of mind to ascertain what the law is.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I have not the time to yield. And if you will read this minority report you will find that in practically every case they have cited they go back to the early days of this Republic. The cases they have cited are found in Howard, in Peters, and in Wheaton, and in other of the earlier reports, where it is admitted that the construction of the Constitution then was not as broad as it is to-day. In connection with that I desire to quote to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WATSON] and commend to his consideration some of the language that he used only last year upon the construction of the Constitution. In a speech that he made upon the floor he referred to some of the earlier decisions of the Supreme Court that had been later modified, and then he went on to say:

But everything changes, Mr. Speaker, in the course of time, and even so conservative a body as the Supreme Court seems to be cognizant of the changes of opinion which take place in the country. Somebody has said of that court, in a spirit of adverse criticism, that the window to its chamber looked out upon the great body of the American people, and it sometimes took judicial cognizance of changes going on among them. I do not subscribe to the criticism in the sense in which it was uttered; but, as a matter of fact, judicial opinions change, and in regard to this subject the mind of the Supreme Court has changed in recent years.

And so it can be said with reference to the minority report. You will observe in this minority report that no comment is made upon the decision in Hoke against the United States, which is the decision in the White Slave cases. No reference is made to the pure-food-act decisions and only passing comment upon the decision in the Lottery cases, and I undertake to say that if we apply the reasoning that was applied in those cases we must conclude that the earlier decisions they have quoted here are substantially modified. Now, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, a little while ago made the statement upon the floor that our power under the interstate-commerce clause related only to goods and merchandise and commodities that were harmful and deleterious in themselves.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will pardon me, I said that was the distinction the Supreme Court had made so far in its line of demarcation.

Mr. LENROOT. And then when the gentleman's attention was called to the pure-food act he escaped from that just as rapidly as possible, because misbranded goods are neither necessarily deleterious nor harmful, and yet they are absolutely shut out of interstate commerce. The gentleman then said the reason that was done was because they perpetrated a fraud upon the public. Granted; and when you get that far, sir, you admit the constitutionality of this bill. And why? Because if it is within our power to prohibit interstate commerce for the purpose of preventing frauds upon the public, we have the same power to prohibit interstate commerce that may produce unfair competition in the public.

The gentleman's own committee reported a bill, which passed this House and is now the law, with reference to unfair competition. Will the gentleman say when a vast majority of the States of this Union have rigid child-labor laws and a few States of the South permit little children, 8, 9, or 10 years old, to work in their factories, that that is fair competition with these Northern States, where they are not permitted to employ children under 14 years old? Is not that as clearly within our power as the power to prevent frauds in the misbranding of goods?

But this is not the only ground upon which the constitutionality of this bill can be sustained. No one has any inherent right to employ child labor in the production of any commodity. On the contrary, the employment of child labor in factories and hazardous occupations is almost universally condemned as wrong. Nearly all of the States have rigid laws prohibiting the employment of child labor in such cases. The right to so prohibit is grounded upon the fact that such employment is detrimental to the public health, the public morals, and the public welfare. That being true, there can be no inherent right to employ the channels of interstate commerce wherever such employment would be detrimental to the public health, public morals, or public welfare. Does it need any argument to support the proposition that to permit manufacturers in a State having no child-labor laws to use the channels of interstate commerce, thus affording a facility for further exploiting child labor, is detrimental to the public health, the public morals, and public welfare? If it is in any degree so detrimental, then our power to close the channels of interstate commerce to any commodity produced under such conditions can not be doubted.

In Hoke v. United States (227 U. S., 523) the court said:

It is misleading to say that men and women have rights. Their rights can not fortify or sanction their wrongs; and if they employ interstate transportation as a facility of their wrongs, it may be forbidden to them to the extent of the act of July 25, 1910, and we need go no further in the present case.

All enlightened public opinion condemns the employment of child labor, in the cases enumerated in this bill, as wrong, and all that the bill seeks to do is to forbid producers of commodities in the cases mentioned in the bill from employing any such transportation as a "facility of their wrongs."

Another thing, Mr. Chairman, the House will remember that last year this House passed a cotton-warehouse bill, a bill that was clearly unconstitutional on the face of it, and not one lawyer on either side of this House dared to get up and argue its constitutionality. Every one of those gentlemen who have argued this morning that this bill is unconstitutional, with one exception—and he was not then a Member—voted for that bill on the ground that we had the right to pass that bill under the public-welfare clause of the Constitution. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WATSON], who signed this minority report, was one who voted for that bill. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. WEBB] voted for it, and the others I have mentioned, and it was not then pretended that that power which was exercised in that bill was exercised under the authority of the interstate-commerce clause or any other clause of the Constitution. [Applause.]

Nearly all of these gentlemen who are now so vehement in insisting upon a strict construction of the Constitution did not exhibit any such attitude at that time. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, whom we all respect and esteem, had charge of the cotton-warehouse bill that I have referred to, when neither he nor any one of its supporters even attempted to show that the provisions of that bill came within our constitutional power. He said:

The truth is, Mr. Speaker, that when there is great general good to be accomplished by legislation I am not so squeamish about the Constitution. I believe that when a thing is to be done, when an object is to be accomplished, it should be reached in the quickest and most direct way.

If the gentleman and his associates could go so far on the cotton-warehouse bill as to support it when no argument could be advanced for its constitutionality, is it too much to ask of them that they cease their opposition to this bill, the enactment of which rests upon an express power granted in the Constitution and "when there is a great general good to be accomplished"?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill because it seems to me to tell directly for the welfare of the child all over the country, not in any particular section of the country, but in every State and every city and town of the United States. I think it tells for the welfare of the child physically and mentally and morally. We all know that where there is an opportunity for the child to be employed under a given age—14 or 16, as the case may be—it impairs and restrains his full physical development. In the first place, it keeps him employed for long hours and perhaps in the midst of insanitary conditions. Oftentimes the air of the mill or the factory where he is employed is laden with lint or is otherwise foul or impure. Oftentimes, too, he will be the sufferer physically by reason of accidents. The very elaborate report of the commission investigating the conditions of woman and child labor throughout the United States, which was completed only a year or two ago, shows that children of tender years are much more liable to physical injuries caused by the machinery in the midst of which they are employed than are those of more mature years.

In the second place, the mental retardation of children who go to work too early necessarily follows. I have not the precise figures in mind, but in States where there are very rigid child-labor laws the children who go to school between the ages of 10 and 14 number about 95 per cent of all children between those ages, whereas in the States where the child-labor laws are less rigid, or where they are less strictly enforced, the percentage of children between the ages of 10 and 14 who are in school range only from about 70 per cent to about 75 per cent. Now, we all know that that difference of 20 or 25 per cent in school attendance of children between the ages of 10 and 14, the formative period of a child's intellectual career, reflects a very dangerous and unfortunate situation.

The percentage of illiteracy in States where child-labor laws are lax is vastly higher than in those where the child-labor laws are very strictly applied and enforced. I have not those figures fully in mind, but my recollection is that in some backward States the percentage of illiteracy is from 14 to 18 times as high as in the States of the other type, which are noteworthy on account of their enforcement of child-labor legislation.

Speaking of the third point—the question of the morals of the children—Dr. Neil, in his report on the moral conditions affecting child labor, has pointed out that there is a direct causal connection between the moral welfare of children and their employment at an early age. He has shown by elaborate tables that the records of the police courts and the delinquency courts show an enormously greater percentage of immorality and delinquency in the case of children who are employed too young than is the case where children are allowed to gain more moral stamina before they go to work for the first time. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WATSON] is recognized for 11 minutes.

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the bill under discussion—commonly known as the child-labor bill—has been in Congress in one form or another for the past 10 years. In substance it makes it a crime to work boys and girls under the age of 14 years in any mill, workshop, cannery, factory, or manufacturing establishment of any kind; or under the age of 16 years in any mine or quarry; or between those ages more than eight hours a day or at all during the hours of night—a crime for which the shipper of goods in interstate commerce, made in whole or in part by such labor, is punishable by fine and imprisonment. To carry out its provisions an extensive system of visit, search, and inspection by the Federal Government is authorized.

It can not be questioned that in recent years a widespread and, in some localities, an almost overwhelming public sentiment has grown up in favor of legislation of this character. Philanthropic and charitable associations have given it the benefit of their support, and organized labor in many sections of the country has freely contributed its very considerable aid.

In the face of such public demand I have not the vanity to suppose for one moment that anything which I can say would affect in any material way the fate of this measure, the passage of which through this body is a foregone conclusion. On the contrary, it were much easier to yield to the amiable impulses of the hour and allow a proposal originating in such kindly motives and introduced under so favorable auspices to pass without comment.

But, Mr. Chairman, though the evil sought to be reached by this law be conceded, and the motives which animate its proposals be ever so commendable, if the remedy proposed is unwise and revolutionary in itself, and beyond the constitutional power of Congress to grant, should not the Representative, charged with the solemn duty of upholding the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof, be willing to lift his voice against the consummation of such a measure and warn his countrymen against the consequences which he thinks must ensue?

It has seemed to me not only that he should be willing but that it is his bounden duty to do so.

NO DIFFERENCE OF OPINION AS TO THE EVIL.

There is no difference of opinion between the advocates and opponents of this bill as to the evil of child labor in any of its moral or physical aspects. As far as law can offer a remedy, I take it that no humane man would be willing to see a single American child condemned to use the spring and seed time of life in consuming physical labor. But that much of the evil in question is beyond the reach of law, is inherent in our nature, and inseparable from our present imperfect condition must be obvious to every thoughtful man. No legislation yet has ever been wise enough to abolish poverty and necessity; and as long as man's needs and wants remain, there will be some, both adult and adolescent, who shall have to toil for daily bread despite the laws of the most enlightened States. It is the duty of the laws to make easy as possible the conditions under which man performs his labor and to see that he is not unjustly deprived of its reward; but beyond that the laws may not go, and he is under God's providence left to work out his own destiny.

THE EXTENT OF THE EVIL TO BE REACHED AND THE PRACTICAL EFFECT OF THE BILL.

Of the countless thousands of young people in the country under the age of 16 years who are compelled to labor of some sort it is not believed that more than 1 in 15 are engaged in the industries affected by this measure. For the myriads of the young who toil upon the farm, in the forests, on the plains, in the counting room, and in all the vast avenues of domestic trade, who ply the streets of great cities in the news and messenger service of a modern civilization, no relief is provided or has even been considered by this bill. Its boon extends only to the factory and the mine.

According to the last census, of the total number of persons in the United States employed in manufactures and mines, aggregating over seven and one-half millions, only 169,644 were under the age of 16 years, and of this latter number fewer than 45,000 reside in States which have not already by local law prescribed the same requirements as to age and night work provided in the bill now before us. North and South Carolina, New Mexico, and Wyoming are now the only States in the Union in which a child under 14 years, unless under special exemption, can be legally admitted to factory work, and in those States, according to the latest returns, only 10,533 under that age were engaged in manufacturing and mechanical occupations.

The bulk of those, therefore, affected by the age and night-hour clauses of the bill are in the textile industries of a few Southern States. The eight-hour provision of the bill would embrace of course a larger number scattered over a much wider area, but however desirable this may be thought of as an ultimate standard, it can not yet claim the sanction of more than half the American States, and it is believed to be true that far more than half of our people engaged in the various professions, trades, and industries of the country still find it necessary to work more than eight hours per day.

It will thus appear that the labor of children of tender years and at night—the subject which has attracted public notice and excited the solicitude of patriotic men and women in all parts of the country—has to-day legal existence in but few American Commonwealths. With the rapid progress of labor laws in all the States, it is confidently hoped that the child labor aimed at here will in a comparatively short period disappear entirely by local legislation. But should we be disappointed in this, economic conditions themselves would eliminate the evil in large measure.

The fact is child labor does not pay; and farsighted business men, albeit moved by no higher motive than gain, are constantly seeking to get rid of it. The committee hearings disclosed that in many instances employers only consent to admit such children to work from motives of humanity to them or their dependent families.

It is not believed that the products of child labor are of such a character or sufficient in volume to make them a serious factor in the economic and commercial life of the country.

To be sure, in some sections just emerging from the social and economic wreck of a great Civil War and entering now upon new industrial life, conditions leave yet much to be desired in the way of educational and vocational advantage; but, considering the means at their disposal, what people anywhere ever advanced so fast and so far against odds so great or face the future now with brighter promise or higher resolve? For years good men and pious women in their midst have devoted their lives with absorbing interest to the solution of this very problem.

These few general observations are submitted not for the purpose of justifying the existence of wrong or injustice in any portion of our common country, much less to defend those, if such there be, who would sacrifice the citizenship of the time to come upon the altar of financial greed, but for the purpose of presenting to your view my own sense of the extent and character of what has been so feelingly described as a "great nation-wide evil."

NO DIFFERENCE IN AIM, BUT IN METHOD.

Conceding, then, the existence of the evil, with the qualifications stated, I yield to no man in the earnest and sincere desire to find a suitable and adequate remedy.

This gentlemen think they have found in the "commerce clause" of the Constitution, and, under its power to regulate commerce among the States, they propose for Congress to exclude from such commerce the products of child labor, and by this method compel the States to enact such laws regulating labor in their midst as will conform to the will of Congress upon this subject. To them it has seemed fit to invoke the aid of the Federal Government upon this question and to rely upon the distant, but very powerful, Legislature of the Nation to deal with its many and, locally, vastly diversified phases.

On the contrary, after diligent search, I have not been able to find in the Constitution any warrant for the remedy proposed; nor, if there were, have I been able to persuade myself that it would be the part of wisdom to employ it. To me and to those who think with me the ages of workmen engaged in manufacturing industries and the hours of labor are in no sense Federal questions, and their regulation can in no proper way be assumed by Congress. To us, therefore, it seems that as far as mere law may be expected to ameliorate our industrial conditions we must look to the wisdom and humanity of the State legislatures, which alone, under our dual form of government, have the power to deal directly with those conditions.

IS THE BILL CONSTITUTIONAL?

The gentlemen who brought this bill from the committee declined any extended discussion of this question in their report, and expressed the opinion it would lead to no "useful result."

Some gentlemen seem amused that such a question should be asked, and others who have taken part in the debate have expressed impatience that their views should be met with "constitutional objections."

All of which means, Mr. Chairman, if it means anything, that a considerable body of public sentiment has been gathering head in the country and now extending to the Congress itself, which is growing impatient with the restraints of a written Constitution, and is disposed to resent the fact that any limit is imposed on the legislative will, however ephemeral the end sought to be attained.

The attitude of some toward the Constitution of their country reminds me very forcibly of a comment made by a distinguished professor of law in the University of Virginia upon the resumption of lectures at that institution at the close of the war. Upon reassembling his classes, he said:

Young gentlemen, you have now reached the stage in your course in which you will be invited to study what, by common courtesy, is still called "constitutional and international law," but in the light of past and projected events I would not be candid if I did not say to you I look upon the subject in the light of a post-mortem examination.

Is the Constitution really dead? And are the gloomy prophesies of this troubled patriarch of the law, overwhelmed at the time by the misfortune of his country, coming so soon to be realized upon the floor of the American Congress? Does the legislator owe no duty to the Constitution which he is bound to respect and can he cast lightly upon the Supreme Court the sole responsibility of determining his own obligation to the supreme law of the land?

If all great questions could be thus summarily disposed of, then, indeed, would the path of the lawmaker be simple and his task quickly performed. But, fortunately for them and perhaps unfortunately for ourselves, a question affecting the vital interests of a hundred million people can not be thus dismissed without debate before the judgment bar. The legislator is the first judge to whom a proposed law can be submitted; under the solemn sanction of official oath it is not only his right but his sworn duty, before he can act at all, to decide in the affirmative that he has the legal right to do what is proposed. It is because he is supposed to have performed this very duty that the courts, in reviewing his action, when in doubt concerning his power, will determine the doubt in his favor and concede the power.

In this connection it was forcibly said by Judge Cooley:

Legislators have their authority measured by the Constitution. They are chosen to do what it permits and nothing more, and they take solemn oaths to obey and support it. When they disregard its provisions, they usurp authority, abuse their trust, and violate the promise they have confirmed by an oath. To pass an act when they are in doubt whether it is not violating the Constitution, is to treat as of no force the most imperative obligation any person can assume. A business agent who would deal in that manner with his principal's business would be treated as untrustworthy; a witness in court who would treat his oath thus lightly and affirm things concerning which he was in doubt would be held a criminal.

Assuming, then, notwithstanding the disinclination of some to be bothered by such inquiries, that the question of constitutional power here involved will have the serious and conscientious consideration of this assembly, let us take up the matter for such examination as the occasion will permit.

OPINION OF THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE IN THE FIFTY-NINTH CONGRESS.

In the Fifty-ninth Congress, in which were pending sundry matters relating to woman and child labor, Mr. Tawney offered the following resolution, which was adopted by the House:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be, and it is hereby, directed to immediately investigate and report to the House at this session the extent of the jurisdiction and authority of Congress over the subject of woman and child labor, and to what extent and by what means Congress has authority to suppress abuses of such labor or to ameliorate conditions surrounding the employment of such laborers.

The Judiciary Committee at the time comprised some very able lawyers in its membership, and was composed as follows:

John J. Jenkins, Richard Wayne Parker, De Alva S. Alexander, Charles E. Littlefield, Robert M. Nevin, Henry W. Parker, George A. Pearre, James N. Gillett, Charles Q. Tirrell, John A. Sterling, B. P. Birdsall, and John H. Foster (Republicans).

D. A. De Armond, D. H. Smith, Henry D. Clayton, Robert L. Henry, John F. Little, and W. G. Brantley (Democrats).

After careful study and review of the authorities upon the question, the committee submitted, on February 6, 1907, a unanimous report to the House, in which it said, among other things:

In the opinion of your committee, there is no question as to the entire want of power on the part of Congress to exercise jurisdiction and authority over the subject of woman and child labor. In fact, it is not a debatable question. It would be a reflection upon the intelligence of Congress to so legislate. It would be casting an unwelcome burden upon the Supreme Court to so legislate. (See Rept. No. 7304, 59th Cong., 2d sess.)

This opinion of its chief law committee was respected by the House at the time, and as a question of law for several years the matter was thought to be at rest. I am informed that the Senate Committee on the Judiciary about the same time found to the same effect upon a similar inquiry.

THE BILL IS UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

Mr. Chairman, in the time allotted it is difficult to discuss with satisfaction a question like this, and I shall have to content myself with an imperfect statement of the reasons which have combined to form my opinion upon this subject.

I submit that this measure is unconstitutional, because—

First. No act of this body in all its legislative history, extending now over a century, can be cited as a precedent for this legislation; and no court of last resort, State or Federal, has ever asserted such a power to reside in Congress.

I do not plead this long record of nonaction and nonassertion as conclusive, of course, but I do present it as powerfully persuasive. In the many vicissitudes through which the country has been called to pass, surely there have been times when the motive for legislation of this kind was not lacking, and the fact that in so long a period such legislation was never attempted or justified beforehand by court deliverance is strong presumptive evidence that the legislative and judicial mind has heretofore discredited the power.

Second. It seeks to do indirectly that which directly it would confessedly be unlawful to attempt.

Will any respectable lawyer upon this floor argue for one moment that it is competent for Congress by direct enactment to fix the hours of labor and the ages of the workmen in the factories and mines within the territorial limits of the States? Yet that is the object and effect of this bill—in fact, its sole object. "So says the bond"; it is express in the exacting clause; the whole context proclaims it. How would such an instrument have answered the constitutional requirements laid down by Judge Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat., 316)?

Let the end be legitimate; let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

And in ascertaining if the end were legitimate and within the scope of the Constitution, what would Judge Story have said:

Every act of the legislature must be judged of from its object and intent, as they are embodied in its provisions. (2 Story on Constitution, 37.)

And in this general connection it was finely said by another great lawyer and judge, Abel P. Upshur:

Congress has no right to employ for one purpose means ostensibly provided for another; to do so would be a positive fraud and a manifest usurpation; for if the purpose be lawful it may be accomplished by its own appropriate means, and if it is unlawful it should not be accomplished at all. Without this check it is obvious that Congress may by indirection accomplish almost any forbidden object. (Upshur on the Federal Government, 98 and post).

Third. It is not a regulation of commerce, but of production.

While nominally purporting to regulate commerce, it in reality regulates the conditions under which goods are made for that commerce; that is, production. The thing aimed at in the bill—child labor—is completed before the thing ostensibly regulated and which alone Congress has power to control—transportation—begins. Commerce is not regulated, but manufacture is. Commerce does not begin until manufacture has ended; and goods are not subject to the commercial regulation of Congress until they have started on their journey into another State.

The legal proposition that the things herein prescribed affect not commerce but conditions anterior, which are amenable to State law alone, I take it as long and well settled by repeated adjudications of the Supreme Court.

Said the court in Coe v. Errol:

There must be a point of time when they (goods) cease to be governed exclusively by domestic law, and begin to be governed and protected by the national law of commercial regulation, and that moment seems to us to be a legitimate one for this purpose in which they commence their final movement from the State of their origin to that of their destination. (116 U. S., 517.)

And again in United States v. Knight Co.:

Commerce succeeds to manufacture and is not a part of it. * * * That which belongs to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the United States; but that which does not belong to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the police power of the States. (157 U. S., 1.)

Fourth. If it be a regulation of manufacture and not of commerce, Congress has no power to make the regulation.

This proposition was already deducible from the court decisions quoted above; but I desire to call especial attention to the celebrated case of Kidd v. Pearson (128 U. S., 1), in which the long and often tortuous line of demarcation between State and Federal power is drawn with striking power and skill.

Said the court:

No distinction is more popular to the common mind or more clearly expressed in economic and political literature than that between manufactures and commerce. Manufacture is transformation—the fashioning of raw materials into a change of form for use. The functions of commerce are different. The buying and selling and the transportation incidental thereto constitute commerce, and the regulation of commerce in the constitutional sense embraces the regulation at least of such transportation. The legal definition of the term, as given by this court in County of Mobile v. Kimball (102 U. S., 691, 702), is as follows:

"Commerce with foreign countries and among the States, strictly considered, consists in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation and the transportation and transit of persons and property as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities."

If it be held that the term includes the regulation of all such manufactures as are intended to be the subject of commercial transactions in the future, it is impossible to deny that it would also include all productive industries that contemplate the same thing. The result would be that Congress would be invested, to the exclusion of the States, with the power to regulate not only manufactures but also agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, mining—in short, every branch of human industry. For is there one of them that does not contemplate more or less clearly an interstate or foreign market? Does not the wheat grower of the Northwest and the cotton planter of the South plant, cultivate, and harvest his crop with an eye on the prices at Liverpool, New York, and Chicago? The power being vested in Congress and denied to the States, it would follow as an inevitable result that the duty would devolve on Congress to regulate all of these delicate, multiform, and vital interests—interests which in their nature are and must be local in all the details of their successful management.

It is not necessary to enlarge on but only to suggest the impracticability of such a scheme when we regard the multitudinous affairs involved and the almost infinite variety of their minute details.

It was said by Chief Justice Marshall that it is a matter of public history that the object of vesting in Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States was to insure uniformity of regulation against conflicting and discriminating State legislation. See also County of Mobile v. Kimball (supra, at p. 697).

This being true, how can it further that object so as to interpret the constitutional provision as to place upon Congress the obligation to exercise the supervisory powers just indicated? The demands of such a supervision would require, not uniform legislation generally applicable throughout the United States, but a swarm of statutes only locally applicable and utterly inconsistent. Any movement toward the establishment of rules of production in this vast country, with its many different climates and opportunities, could only be at the sacrifice of the peculiar advantages of a large part of the localities in it, if not of every one of them. On the other hand, any movement toward the local, detailed, and incongruous legislation required by such interpretation would be about the widest possible departure from the declared object of the clause in question. Nor this alone. Even in the exercise of the power contended for Congress would be confined to the regulation, not of certain branches of industry, however numerous, but to those instances in each and every branch where the producer contemplated an interstate market.

These instances would be almost infinite, as we have seen, but still there would always remain the possibility, and often it would be the case that the producer contemplated a domestic market. In that case the supervisory power must be executed by the State; and the interminable trouble would be presented that whether the one power or the other should exercise the authority in question would be determined not by any general or intelligible rule but by the secret and changeable intention of the producer in each and every act of production. A situation more paralyzing to the State governments and more provocative of conflicts between the General Government and the States and less likely to have been what the framers of the Constitution intended it would be difficult to imagine.

Fifth. If it be held in fact a regulation of commerce, there is no direct and substantial relation in the provisions of the bill and the commerce assumed to be regulated.

It is difficult to imagine how the requirements of this measure could affect in any direct, practical way the commerce it involves. There is no rule of traffic or transportation laid down by which the facility or safety of commerce is to be promoted; and, as far as can be seen, it would add nothing to and take nothing from the volume of existing commerce. The identical articles sought to be outlawed would continue in the commerce of the future, with the sole difference that an incident of their manufacture will have been changed. Manifestly, then, the regulation proposed can have no effect upon commerce as such. In fact it has no real relation to commerce. It is not intended to have; its effect is entirely retroactive, and is designed to operate upon an ordinary relation of life—that of master and servant engaged in private business—a relation never before now supposed to be subject to any but domestic law.

That Congress has no power to prescribe arbitrarily a rule for commerce having no direct and substantial relation to that commerce has been adjudged by the Supreme Court in many well-considered cases. One of the most interesting of these, perhaps, was that of Adair v. United States (208 U. S., 161), decided at the October term, 1907, in which a portion of the act—known as the Erdman Act—was declared to be unconstitutional. It will be remembered that a section of that act forbade railroads engaged in interstate commerce to discharge from their employment an employee because of his membership in any labor organization. Here both employer and employee, while engaged in the business of interstate commerce, were confessedly subject to any reasonable regulation which Congress might prescribe for the conduct of their business. But the court declared that the regulation described above had no real relation to the commerce sought to be regulated, and for that reason it was beyond the power of Congress to prescribe, unconstitutional, and void. Mr. Justice Harlan, the same who had rendered the opinion in the Lottery cases, so much relied upon to uphold this measure, said:

The power to regulate interstate commerce is the power to prescribe rules by which such commerce must be governed. Of course, as has often been said, Congress has a larger discretion in the selection or choice of the means to be employed in the regulation of interstate commerce, and such discretion is not to be interfered with except where that which is done is in plain violation of the Constitution. * * * In this connection we may refer to Johnson v. Railroad (196 U. S., 1), relied on in argument, which case arose under the act of March, 1893. That act required carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their cars used in such commerce with automatic couplers and continuous brakes, and their locomotives with driving-wheel brakes. But the act upon its face showed that its object was to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads, and this court sustained its validity upon the ground that it manifestly had reference to interstate commerce and was calculated to subserve the interests of such commerce by affording protection to employees and travelers. It was held that there was a substantial connection between the object sought to be attained by the act and the means provided to accomplish that object. So in regard to the employers' liability cases (207 U. S., 463), decided at the present term. In that case the court sustained the authority of Congress, under its power to regulate commerce, to prescribe the rule of liability as between interstate carriers and their employees in such interstate commerce, in cases of personal injuries received by employees while actually engaged in such commerce. The decision on this point was placed on the ground that a rule of that character would have direct reference to the conduct of interstate commerce and would, therefore, be within the competency of Congress to establish for commerce among the States, but not as to commerce completely internal to a State.

Manifestly, any rule prescribed for the conduct of interstate commerce, in order to be within the competency of Congress under its power to regulate commerce among the States, must have some real or substantial relation to or connection with the commerce regulated. But what possible legal or logical connection is there between an employee's membership in a labor organization and the carrying on of interstate commerce? Such relation to a labor organization can have in itself and in the eye of the law no bearing upon the commerce with which the employee is connected by his labor and services. * * * It results, on the whole case, that the provision of the statute under which the defendant was convicted must be held to be repugnant to the fifth amendment and as not embraced by nor within the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, but under the guise of regulating interstate commerce and as applied to this case it arbitrarily sanctions an illegal invasion of the personal liberty as well as the right of property of the defendant Adair.

Sixth. It is not a regulation, but an absolute embargo against articles sound and harmless in themselves.

Regulation presupposes the existence of the thing to be regulated; a rule intended to and which does entirely destroy a given commerce can scarcely be deemed in law a reasonable regulation of that commerce.

I do not forget that in legislating upon foods, drugs, explosives, lottery tickets, and, perhaps, other subjects, Congress has so regulated as, in some instances, to proscribe altogether the traffic affected. I am not unmindful of the fact that impure foods have been excluded from interstate commerce; that diseased meats have been denied its instrumentalities; that false and fraudulent branding has been prohibited; that lottery tickets have been excluded from the instrumentalities of interstate commerce; and likewise human beings when transported for immoral purposes. But I would ask any lawyer in this body, aye go further and ask any intelligent laymen, whether or not a single article included in the list has any right of itself to constitute any part of the commerce between the States? The judge who delivered the opinion in the lottery cases paused time and time again to declare that this traffic in gaming was a traffic which no man was entitled to pursue as a matter of right. In those cases Justice Harlan said:

It is a kind of traffic which no one can be entitled to pursue as a matter of right. (Champion v. Ames, 188 U. S., 321.)

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the gentleman believe that the traffic or business of dealing in the labor of little children under 14 years of age is a traffic that no man should have the right to pursue?

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. I will try to answer the gentleman at the proper time. Does any man in this Congress believe that a citizen in one State of this Union should have the right to transport to another State a woman for immoral purposes? Does any man here believe that a consignment of tainted meat has a right to be shipped from one State to another? Does the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] believe that an article of goods can be misbranded and a citizen of one State perpetrate a fraud upon the citizen of another State?

I say, gentlemen, without fear of successful contradiction, that in no legislative act of this body from the foundation of the Government has any article, sound in itself, not misbranded, and representing a business which a man had a right to conduct, ever been excluded from interstate commerce.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. Does the gentleman believe that the National Government should have the right to inspect slaughterhouses to determine the method of construction before the exportation of those meats?

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, that opens a very interesting legal question, which I have not the time to take up at this point. I take pleasure in saying to the gentleman that if I have leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I will try to answer that question.

Mr. DILLON. And one other question. What is the difference between that case and one affecting the welfare of the child?

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. I will try to answer that also.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am endeavoring to demonstrate the further fact that under its power over interstate commerce Congress has never undertaken to exclude from commerce a single, solitary article which the State itself had not the lawful right, under its police power, to exclude, if it had been able to exercise adequate physical control over it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Has not every State the right to prohibit child labor within the State?

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. I think so.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then wherein lies the applicability of the question?

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. The point I am trying to make is that in all those cases in which Congress has heretofore "outlawed" certain articles from commerce it acted not in contravention of State law and against its inalienable police power, but in aid thereof. My view is that in exercising this power Congress can not invade the police power of the State nor curtail the liberty of its citizens under the fifth amendment.

In all these cases the legitimacy of the act is rested by the courts upon the principle that the articles upon which an embargo was laid never had the right to enter commerce or to use its instrumentalities.

Assuming, then, all that these precedents may imply, can Congress arbitrarily deny admission to interstate commerce of a bolt of cotton cloth, for example, sound in itself, not misbranded, of use and value, and incapable of affecting the peace and morals of those to whom it is consigned, because, forsooth, it has been made by a child in North Carolina, let us say, who had attained the age at which he or she was entitled to work under the law of that State?

This question is predicated upon a concrete case, and upon its correct answer, it seems to me, hangs all the law in this controversy.

Before considering it from the standpoint of the inferences which may be drawn from partially analogous cases already adjudicated by the courts, I invite your attention briefly to the history of the "commerce clause" and the way in which it came to find a place in our organic law.

It is well known that after the Revolution the States early became involved in strife among themselves concerning their trade, both foreign and domestic. The dispute between Maryland and Virginia on this subject led to the convention at Annapolis, and it in turn to the convention at Philadelphia which framed the Federal Constitution.

Under the Confederation each State possessed the right to control the commerce of its own citizens and with the outside world. It could prescribe such regulations as it pleased at its boundaries or forbid trade beyond altogether. Under this system vexatious restrictions upon commerce grew up everywhere, and the prosperity and progress of the newly formed Commonwealths were seriously threatened.

I do not, I think, put it too strongly to say that the strongest motive which drove the States into a Federal Union was commercial—the desire to enjoy freedom of trade among themselves, unhampered by local restrictions and embargoes. Thus was it to escape restrictions and embargoes and have free trade among themselves that the States consented to confer upon the Federal Government the power to regulate commerce.

If these things be so, may it not be said as a matter of history that it was never intended that the power given to Congress should be used to prohibit lawful commerce among the States?

In his excellent commentary on the Constitution, discussing this question, the late John Randolph Tucker said:

> Under the Articles of Confederation the States could interdict trade inter se. The grant of power to Congress to regulate commerce was with the purpose not to transfer this power of interdicting interstate trade to Congress, but to leave interstate commerce free, as the Constitution intended, in order to form a more perfect union. Could the Constitution have intended to destroy the freedom of interstate trade by congressional power, when it took it from the States and vested it in Congress in order to prevent such destruction? (2 Tucker on Constitution, 528.)

And again:

> But there is another clause of the Constitution which is clearly a denial of any such power by Congress. It declares that "citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." It will be perceived that this is a declaration of the personal right of every citizen and belongs to him as such. No Federal or State law gives it to him. He holds it by the higher title of the Constitution itself. If, therefore, any regulation of commerce should invade the right conferred by this article, it would be, under Judge Marshall's canon, prohibited to Congress by the Constitution. It is a personal right which neither Congress nor a State can impair. * * *
> It is clear, therefore, that this right conferred by the Constitution upon the citizens of each State included free ingress and regress of persons and property and the like, and put them beyond the reach of the power of the States, and, a fortiori, beyond the power of the Federal Government. * * *
> Congress may regulate such commerce so as to promote it and secure its safety, but can not forbid it or tax it. * * *
> The whole Constitution, in all its parts, looks to the security of free trade in persons and goods between the States of the Union, and by this clause prohibits either Congress or the States to interfere with freedom of intercourse and trade. (Idem, pp. 530, 533, citing 7 How., 413, The Slaughter House cases, the Passenger cases, and Ward v. Maryland, 12 Wall., 410.)

To the same view spoke the Supreme Court in Railroad Co. v. Richmond (19 Wall., 584):

> The power to regulate commerce among the several States was vested in Congress in order to secure equality and freedom in commercial intercourse against discriminating State legislation; * * * designed to remove trammels upon transportation between different States which had previously existed, and to prevent the creation of such trammels in the future.

Further illustrating the view that the "commerce clause" was framed that the people might be the better protected in their commercial rights and privileges, and not that these rights should be curtailed and destroyed, we may consider the opinions expressed by eminent publicists and authors who have written upon the subject.

Watson, in his work on the Constitution, says:

> Clearly akin to the question of regulating manufacturing is the question whether Congress can forbid the hauling of a commodity by a carrier of interstate commerce which was manufactured in a State, for instance, by women and children under a certain age, as has recently been maintained. This question is of far-reaching effect, and if such power exists in Congress it would result in the most complete invasion of the sovereignty of the States by the Federal Government which has ever been accomplished by the Federal Constitution. * * * Has Congress, under the power to regulate commerce, the power arbitrarily to deprive individuals or commercial agencies of the exercise of a privilege which is necessarily inherent in the right of citizenship and the right of transacting business? The Constitution will enforce rights which the citizens of this country are entitled to have, exercise, and enjoy rather than destroy them. * * *
> The commerce clause refutes the idea that Congress can prohibit the transportation of an innocuous article by an interstate carrier. The word "regulate" does not mean prohibit. * * * There is no power in Congress to control the manufacture of goods in the States destined for interstate or foreign commerce, and consequently Congress is unable to control the labor of persons engaged in manufacturing products in the States which are intended for interstate or foreign business. Such regulations are left to the State. The power to make such regulations resided there before the Constitution was adopted, or the Union was formed, and it was not surrendered by the States to the General Government. (Vol. 1, pp. 524 and 31.)

Ex-President and ex-Judge Taft says:

> Bills have been urged upon Congress to forbid interstate commerce in goods made by child labor. Such proposed legislation has failed chiefly because it was thought beyond the Federal power. The distinction between the power exercised in enacting the pure-food bill and that which would have been necessary in the case of the child-labor bill is that Congress in the former is only preventing interstate commerce from being a vehicle for conveyance of something which would be injurious to people at its destination, and it might properly decline to permit the use of interstate commerce for that detrimental result. In the latter case Congress would be using its regulative power of interstate commerce not to effect any result of interstate commerce. Articles made by child labor are presumably as good and useful as articles made by adults. The proposed law is to be enforced to discourage the making of articles by child labor in the State from which the articles were shipped. In other words, it seeks indirectly and by duress to compel the States to pass a certain kind of legislation that is completely within their discretion to enact or not. Child labor in the State of the shipment has no legitimate or germane relation to the interstate commerce of which the goods thus made are to form a part, to its character, or to its effect. Such an attempt of Congress to use its power of regulating such commerce to suppress the use of child labor in the State of shipment would be a clear usurpation of that State's rights. (Popular Government, pp. 142, 143.)

In their valuable book on the Commerce Clause of the Federal Constitution (p. 305), Messrs. Prentice and Egan say:

> The right to engage in interstate commerce is one of the rights reserved to the people and one of the privileges and immunities of citizenship. Congress can not lay an embargo upon interstate commerce, nor can it, in national matters, make restrictions of unequal operation among the States. The purpose with which the grant was made—to secure freedom of transportation throughout the country unembarrassed by differing regulations of State lines—measures not only the power of the States but also the power of Congress. (Citing in support thereof the opinion of Mr. Justice McLean in Grove v. Slaughter 15 Peters, 449.)

Mr. Chairman, I trust I have found sufficient answer to this question in the negative from the standpoint of history and of approved text writers upon the Constitution. I come now to consider how may stand the question when tested by the light of judicial decision. It is, perhaps, entirely safe to say that had such a question arisen at any time prior to the period in which the Lottery case was decided, the judgment of the courts would have been adverse to the power claimed here. It is not so much what was decided in that case, as some of the reasons assigned by the court for its decision, which has made it come to be regarded in some quarters as epoch making and making a change in judicial thought respecting the Constitution.

In discussing the right of Congress to exclude lottery tickets from interstate commerce, the judge rendering opinion for the court in that case did ask:

> Are we prepared to say that a provision which is, in effect, a prohibition of the carriage of such articles from State to State is not a fit or appropriate mode for the regulation of that particular kind of commerce? If lottery traffic, carried on through interstate commerce, is a matter of which Congress may take cognizance and over which its power may be exerted, can it be possible that it must tolerate the traffic and simply regulate the manner in which it may be carried on? Or may not Congress, for the protection of the people of all the States, and under the power to regulate interstate commerce, devise such means, within the scope of the Constitution and not prohibited by it, as will drive that traffic out of commerce among the States? (Champion v. Ames, 188 U. S., 355.)

And, again, he did say:

> As a State may, for the purpose of guarding the morals of its own people, forbid all sales of lottery tickets within its limits, so Congress, for the purpose of guarding the people of the United States against the "widespread pestilence of lotteries" and to protect the commerce which concerns all the States, may prohibit the carrying of lottery tickets from one State to another. (Idem, p. 357.)

Such, by way of inquiry and illustration, is the reasoning by which the learned judges sought to sustain the judgment rendered in this important case. As far as I know, it was the first time in the judicial history of the country when the intimation was dropped from that court that the Federal Government possessed any general police power, and that Congress, like the States, might legislate objectively for the morals of the general public.

Upon the incidental dicta of this opinion which was delivered in 1902, has been since erected a considerable superstructure of constitutional interpretation, to my mind, unjustified by the event and demanding conclusions far in advance of what was contemplated by the court at the time.

Of such, for instance, was the claim made before your committee by a learned professor of the law in a leading university (see Com. Rept., p. 16) that the validity of an act of Congress like this was no longer to be tried by the Constitution, but by a "legislative and sociological test"—whatever that may mean.

But that decision stands for itself, it is a part of our judicial history, and it is our duty to analyze its meaning and ascertain, if we may, from the surrounding circumstances how far its motives and reasonings are likely to be accepted as a rule for future adjudications of kindred questions.

It will not be amiss to state that the decision in the lottery case came only upon the thrice argued cause, and then from a nearly evenly divided court; the distinguished presiding magistrate feeling constrained to join in an earnest dissent.

That the precise point in issue in that case—to wit, the power of Congress to exclude lottery tickets from interstate commerce—differed in, at least, two very material circumstances from the question involved here, can, I think, be plainly displayed.

First. The lottery ticket represented an illegal business; it was the evidence of a gambling contract which could not be enforced by either State or Federal law; its delivery through interstate commerce was necessary to complete such contract.

In discussing the extent of control that might be exercised upon such an article of commerce, the court said:

> In determining whether regulation may not under some circumstances properly take the form or have the effect of prohibition, the nature of the interstate traffic which it was sought by the act of May 2, 1895, to suppress can not be overlooked. * * * It is a kind of traffic which no one can be entitled to pursue as of right. (Idem., pp. 355, 358.)

It can not be contended that the product of child labor, made in accordance with State law, occupies any such category in interstate commerce as this: That it represented any unlawful business, or that its delivery through the channels of interstate trade is necessary to the completion of any part of an illegal contract.

Second. The drawing of lotteries and the sale of lottery tickets had been forbidden by municipal law in perhaps every State of the Union, and therefore the exclusion of such tickets from interstate commerce was not only not in conflict with the inalienable police power of the States, but in direct aid thereof. That this circumstance had material bearing upon the judgment rendered is evidenced by the language of the court:

> In legislating upon the subject of the traffic in lottery tickets as carried on through interstate commerce, Congress only supplemented the action of those States—perhaps all of them—which for the protection of the public morals prohibit the drawing of lotteries as well as the sale or circulation of lottery tickets within their respective limits. It said, in effect, that it would not permit the declared policy of the States, which sought to protect their people against the mischiefs of the lottery business, to be overthrown or disregarded by the agency of interstate commerce. (Idem, p. 357.)

Surely no analogy can be found between the situation of the lottery tickets herein described—outlawed by every State—and that of child-made goods manufactured in accordance with State law and denied sale in no State in the Union. To prohibit the commerce in the former case was to recognize and uphold the authority of the States over their domestic administration; to prohibit it in the latter would be to subvert local self-government and defy State law.

Furthermore, that the decision in this case might not be drawn upon as a precedent in the future for further extension of legislative power, the court was at pains to declare that it meant to decide no question but the precise one in issue:

> We decide nothing more in the present case than that lottery tickets are subjects of traffic among those who choose to sell or buy them; that the carriage of such tickets by independent carriers from one State to another is therefore interstate commerce; that under its power to regulate commerce among the several States Congress—subject to the limitations imposed by the Constitution upon the exercise of the powers granted—has plenary authority over such commerce, and may prohibit the carriage of such tickets from State to State; and that legislation to that end and of that character is not inconsistent with any limitation or restriction imposed upon the exercise of the powers granted to Congress. (Idem, pp. 363–364.)

Likewise, to disarm those who might incline to find in this opinion authority for the exercise of arbitrary and unrestricted control over commerce by Congress, the court said:

> We may, however, repeat, in this connection, what the court has heretofore said, that the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States, although plenary, can not be deemed arbitrary, since it is subject to such limitations or restrictions as are prescribed in the Constitution. This power therefore may not be exercised so as to infringe rights secured or protected by that instrument. It would not be difficult to imagine legislation that would be justly liable to such an objection as that stated, and be hostile to the objects for the accomplishment of which Congress was invested with the general power to regulate commerce among the several States. (Idem, p. 363.)

So that, Mr. Chairman, after all has been said, it pleases me to believe that the decision in the lottery case, notwithstanding the apparent leaning of its dicta, will work no revolution in judicial thought concerning the Constitution; that the police power of the States—or their authority to regulate the manners, morals, health, and occupation of their people—declared to be inalienable by a long line of decisions from the same court, is substantially unimpaired by that decision; and that an act of Congress not incidentally but objectively nullifying State law will itself be pronounced unconstitutional and void.

CONCEDING IT TO BE CONSTITUTIONAL THE BILL OUGHT NOT TO PASS.

The evil sought to be cured is too limited, both in area and probable duration, to justify the exercise of the immense and sometimes harsh power of the Federal Government.

Besides there is no satisfactory reason for supposing that Congress can deal with it more wisely or effectually than the State legislatures. In fact, the contrary seems much more likely. If it be true that the State is a better guardian for the child than its own natural parents and is ready to make more sacrifices for its welfare, then I would sooner trust the destiny of my child to the wisdom and humanity of the legislature of my own State, familiar with local conditions and able to legislate directly therefor, than to rely upon a distant Congress, unacquainted with local needs, operating through general laws unsuited, it may be, to many localities, and compelled to deal with great social and moral questions, if it deal with them at all, through the doubtful efficacy of indirect and devious commercial regulations.

Indeed, when we consider the vast and conflicting interests of our people—their diversified soil, climate, occupations, and business methods, their inequality of wealth, of educational and industrial development—it is obvious that Congress would possess neither the information nor the means to regulate successfully the domestic affairs of the people upon so large and complicated a field.

Mr. Chairman, to pass this bill now, as was aptly said by another, would be a precedent which would permit "many an error by the same example to creep into the State." It is estimated that over 90 per cent of the products of our manufactures are consumed in States other than those in which they originate, and hence sooner or later find their way into interstate commerce. To permit Congress to prescribe the conditions under which this vast commerce shall be produced is to give at once power to control by internal regulation the industrial life of the Nation. And will the demand for this sort of law stop with the factory and the mine? Will the legislative lion, having once tested his strength, lie down to rest by the door of the factory and at the mouth of the mine, or will he rise up to extend his conquest to the forest and in the field? The corn of Nebraska, the wheat of Minnesota, the tobacco of Kentucky, the cotton of Arkansas, the cattle of Texas, the lumber of Oregon have all, like the products of the mine and the factory, to find their way to market through the door of interstate commerce. Having fixed the age limit for the factory and the mine, why should not Congress do the same for the farm and the pasture and the lumber camp? And if it fix the age and hours of labor, why should it not prescribe the sex, the language, the educational standard, the task, and the wage of the laborer? Why not? It has twice already prescribed a literacy test for the immigrant seeking a home upon our shores; will it not be ready, if conflicting interests demand, to impose an educational standard upon the domestic workman?

And when it has once had jurisdiction over the vast and complex field of domestic toil—there to regulate the daily lives of the people in the grave social, racial, and economic problems which confront them—what function will there remain for the States to perform in our dual system; what will be left of local self-government—that birthright of our race come down to us all the way from Runnymede to Yorktown?

No; we believe with the Supreme Court in the case of the United States against Knight Co.:

> It is vital that the independence of the commercial power and of the police power, and the delimitation between them, however sometimes perplexing, should always be recognized and observed; for while the one furnishes the strongest bond of union, the other is essential to the preservation of the autonomy of the States as required by our dual form of government; and acknowledged evils, however grave and urgent they may appear to be, had better be borne than the risk to be run in the effort to suppress them of more serious consequences by resort to expedients of even doubtful constitutionality. (156 U. S., 12.)

And with a great Chief Justice, now gathered to his fathers, that—

> The Constitution speaks not only in the same words but with the same meaning and intent with which it spoke when it came from the hands of its framers and was voted on and adopted by the people of the United States. Any other rule of construction would abrogate the judicial character of this court and make it the mere reflex of the popular opinion or passion of the day. (19 How., 393.)

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of the committee's time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, there is something very amusing about this discussion and the attacks made upon North Carolina. North Carolina is not the only State that sins against the child. You have 2,000,000 children working in the factories and mines of the United States. They are not all in North Carolina. While I favor this bill, I favor it merely as a step forward. When you regulate child labor you regulate a vice. By regulating a vice you retain it. The proper thing for us to do is not to regulate child labor, but to eliminate it by making it impossible; and the time is not far distant when the awakened conscience of the people will make it impossible for any child below the age of 16 to work in any factory or mine.

When gentlemen lack argument they run to the Constitution for protection. They go to the grave and seek for reasons in the graveyard.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman let me ask him a question right at that point?

Mr. LONDON. No; I will not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. LONDON. As if all the wisdom of the human race was buried in 1787, as if we had all the time to go back to 1787 to find what we shall do, and what we shall think, and how we shall legislate on every problem that comes up before the people. [Applause.] The generations that came after 1787 have never abdicated the right to legislate. We of this generation have the right to legislate as time demands.

We are told that the white-slave act is constitutional, but that the child-labor law is unconstitutional. Why, if it was constitutional for Congress to legislate upon a simple moral proposition which involves the violation of the decalogue, I say that by exploiting child labor you violate that canon of the decalogue which says, "Thou shalt not kill." [Applause.] And not only the State of North Carolina, but that glorious State of Massachusetts and the other glorious States are alike guilty of that offense. They are still exploiting child labor, and it is a pleasure to see the Republicans and Democrats falling over each other in expressing their love for the child.

I hope to see the day when we shall not only have a national law which shall make child labor impossible, but when we shall have a national compulsory education law which will make it impossible for some States to have 20 per cent of native illiterates. I hope to see that day.

Do not quarrel with the times. Whether you Republicans or Democratis want it or not, you must march along the broad road of social legislation. We, the socialists, hold a whip over you, and compel you to work in the direction indicated by an awakened national conscience. You will have to legislate for the child. You will have to legislate for the workingman. You will have to legislate for shorter hours of labor. You will have to legislate for better conditions. You can not help it. The socialist movement, representing at this moment, it is true, the extreme view, compels you to march forward.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield for a question now?

Mr. LONDON. Yes, if I have the time.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman has the time. Does he consider himself bound by the Constitution which he swore to support?

Mr. LONDON. Yes; certainly.

Mr. GORDON. Would the gentleman vote for a bill if he knew it was in violation of the Constitution?

Mr. LONDON. Certainly not. I consider myself bound by the Constitution; I took an oath to oppose all enemies, foreign and domestic. I consider a man to be a domestic enemy who is a reactionary, and who refuses to heed the lessons of to-day. [Applause.]

Under leave to extend my remarks I submit the following:

The general debate on the subject was confined to two hours—one hour to the opponents and one hour to the advocates of the bill. With a number of gentlemen desiring to speak on each side, the opportunity for a thorough discussion of the essential principles involved in this legislation is rather limited.

Among the industrial demands of the Socialist Party dealing with the conservation of human resources, there is none more appealing than the demand for the prohibition of the employment of children under 16 years of age. I therefore feel constrained to discuss the subject at some length.

The bill purports to obtain an improvement in the condition of child workers. It prohibits the transportation from one State to the other of the products of a mine or quarry in which children under the age of 16 years are employed, or of a factory, mill, and so forth, in which children under the age of 14 are employed, or in which children under 16 are permitted to work more than eight hours a day or more than six days a week or at night.

The bill provides for national supervision. A number of individual States have higher standards.

In every State whenever legislation is proposed that in any way tends to curtail the power of the employer over the helpless employee, whether it be man, woman, or child, the employers of that particular State argue that competition by employers in other States will ruin their industries in the affected State. The New York manufacturers point at New Jersey and say New Jersey will ruin them. New Jersey points at Pennsylvania, Pennsylvania at Maryland, and all of them at the Southern States. The Southern States, with a great deal of merit, argue that Massachusetts and New York and other States still exploit the child.

Industry knows no State boundaries. Ninety per cent of the products manufactured in each State find their way into other States. At the time the Constitution of the United States was adopted the Colonies put all sorts of difficulties in each other's way. Some collected a tax on incoming goods, some on outgoing goods. It was with the object of providing a free flow of commerce throughout the country that the exclusive power was vested in the National Government "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes."

It is now sought to utilize the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States in the effort to extend the protection of the National Government over the child in industry.

It is significant that the National Association of Manufacturers has appeared in opposition to the proposed bill. It was the contention of the representative of the National Association of Manufacturers that such legislation was unconstitutional and was within the exclusive province of the States. In State legislatures employers argue that unless the legislation is to be uniform throughout the country industry will be destroyed.

The child bears the brunt of the contest. The child's life is being crushed, while the merry argument goes on. What shall it be, the State or the Nation, that is to save the young from perdition? The answer of the commercial soul is—neither.

In sweatshop and in tenement, in quarry and mine, in factory and mill, North, South, West, and East—everywhere—the child's back is bent as the slave's back was bent in the good old days of chattel slavery.

There is more than one way of utilizing the power now existing in Congress for the benefit of the child. The taxing power of Congress was invoked on behalf of the worker when Congress passed the Esch phosphorous-match law. This law was aimed at and did strike at an industry which was responsible for the horrible disease known as "phossy jaw."

The courts have sustained a law prohibiting the use of the mails for the purpose of sending lottery tickets; the courts have sustained a law prohibiting the transportation of women for immoral purposes from State to State; the courts have sustained the pure food and drugs act, which deals with an ordinary proposition of commercial honesty; dating back to the days when the Prophets called the wrath of Jehovah upon the users of false weights and false measures, every State has been dealing with this problem. Nevertheless the Federal Legislature found it necessary to use the power given to it under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution to prohibit the use of the instrumentalities of commerce to fraudulently branded articles.

Under these circumstances it is hard to see how the courts can refuse to sustain the validity of a law which, in response to the new morality of our age, seeks to save the child from destruction.

The proposed law touches only the surface of the evil. There are 2,000,000 children employed in gainful occupations in the United States. "Gainful occupations" is the euphonious phrase used in statistical reports. How gainful those occupations are one can easily gather when he considers the small earnings of families where father, mother, and children, competing with one another, barely eke out a living. That excessive work stunts the body, stupefies the mind, and prevents the normal growth of a human being can no longer be disputed. In a number of industries, through the persistent efforts of organized labor, adults have obtained the eight-hour day. It seems to be universally conceded that eight hours for work, eight hours for sleep, and eight hours for study, exercise, and recreation should be about the normal division of the day in the life of a civilized man. How cruel it is to class the child of 16 with the adult!

There is no attempt made in the proposed legislation to get at the root of the problem of the exploitation of the child. We legislate in driblets. There is no method about this legislation. It lacks plan and system. Provision should be made to enable the child emancipated from the factory and mine to obtain an education. A helping hand should be extended to the parents who have been forced to send their children to work, so that they may adjust themselves to the change.

There is too much sham, too much hypocrisy, too many crocodile tears about our present child-labor legislation, and entirely too little constructive action. We must eliminate child labor. We must educate the child. We must help the parent in his struggle for existence.

The horrifying details of the underfed condition of children in our large cities are too shocking to be restated here. It is not enough to send a child to school if the child is not to receive sufficient nourishment. According to the report of the United States Commission on Industrial Relations, from 12 to 20 per cent of the school children in our largest cities are noticeably underfed. According to the same report, only one-third of all children in our public schools complete the grammar-school course—and Heaven knows that is not much—and less than 10 per cent graduate from the high schools. Take this in connection with the fact, also brought out by the Commission on Industrial Relations, that in the families of workers 37 per cent of the mothers are at work and unable to give to the children proper attention and you will realize that the problem of the child's welfare is something that can not be left to the philanthropy of the employer, nor to charitable ladies, but that it must be taken up by the people themselves as a fundamental problem. It is a problem of life and death, a problem involving the very safety of this Republic and the very existence of the Nation.

I give here a statistical table showing the latest official figures on child labor from the United States census of occupations, 1910. These include the number of children employed in manufacturing and mechanical industries, in extraction of minerals, in agriculture, and in all other occupations. These figures should be studied carefully. In some States there is no adequate source of information as to the exact number of children employed. Some States fail to provide for the registration of births, and the enumerators must obtain their information as to the age of the child from the employer. In other cases they obtain this information from parents, who, in their distress and in their despair, misrepresent the age of the children.

The latest official figures on child labor.

With the genius of man evolving machine after machine, with discovery after discovery making the work of man easier and more productive, with steam and electricity harnessed for the use of man, there is no excuse for the exploitation of the child.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled——

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. The section has not been read yet.

Mr. SHERLEY. I thought I would get in on the enacting clause. I move to strike out the last word of the enacting clause.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not make the motion until the section is read.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not sure about that.

Mr. MANN. I am.

Mr. SHERLEY. A motion to strike out the enacting clause would be in order, and if that be true it ought to be equally true that a motion to strike out a part of the enacting clause is in order, without waiting for the first section to be read.

Mr. MANN. The motion to strike out the enacting clause takes precedence after the section is read.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not want to take the time of the committee in a discussion of that question and will wait until the paragraph is read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That no producer, manufacturer, or dealer shall ship or deliver for shipment in interstate commerce the product of any mine or quarry situated in the United States which has been produced, in whole or in part, by the labor of children under the age of 16 years, or the product of any mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment situated in the United States which has been produced, in whole or in part, by the labor of children under the age of 14 years or by the labor of children between the ages of 14 years and 16 years who work more than eight hours in any one day, or more than six days in any one week, or after the hour of 7 o'clock p. m., or before the hour of 7 o'clock a. m.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It is needless for me to say to this House that I have no sympathy with the idea frequently expressed here to-day by those who in their zeal for this measure say that considerations of constitutional power are not made in good faith, or are to be neglected. For my own part, I believe that it is the duty of every Member to decide the constitutionality of a question, and if in doubt to resolve that doubt against the constitutionality, just as I believe it is the duty of every court in passing upon the constitutionality of a law, if in doubt, to resolve that doubt in favor of the constitutionality. A very brief statement will show the reason for that. The court must assume that the legislative body has tried to keep within the sphere of its legitimate activities, and therefore when in doubt gives the benefit of the doubt in favor of the legitimacy of the action of the legislative body. But that body itself, dealing with a matter, in order to be careful that it does not overstep the limits of its power, must decide its doubts against its power.

I say this as a prelude to what I am now going to say, touching the constitutionality of this act. I have not had the time to give to a renewed study of the matter that I would like; but, perhaps, there is no subject that I have studied as much as I have that relative to the power that is conferred under the commerce clause of the Constitution; and while the decision in the Lottery cases is not in accord with what I formerly conceived to be the power of the Federal Government over interstate commerce; while I believe that originally that power was given to the Federal Government in order to keep commerce free from regulation by the States, and without any idea of it being used to regulate even to the point of prohibiting, just as the power was given to the Federal Government over foreign commerce in order to enable Congress to prohibit it, still I hope I am lawyer enough to recognize the finality of a Supreme Court decision; and after reading, and to-day rereading, the decision of the Supreme Court in the Lottery cases, I am forced to the conclusion that this Congress has power to deal with this matter in the way proposed. [Applause.]

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield for a moment.

Mr. LENROOT. Merely for information, I want to ask the gentleman whether he distinguishes between doubt as to the constitutionality of a proposition and doubt as to what the Supreme Court might hold with reference to it?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, of course, I think a lawyer, or anyone, in considering the constitutionality of a provision must consider it largely in the light of what the court has said the Constitution means. A man who does not do that is more or less lawless, and he has no right to talk about law—and particularly about constitutional law—if he is not willing to accept the law as laid down by the body authorized to decide finally.

Now, coming to the concrete question, the Lottery cases decided, first, that the right to regulate carried with it the right to prohibit. That was the marked forward step taken by the court in that decision. Then, having decided in favor of the right to prohibit, the court held that an intrastate commerce which the States plainly could prohibit as being against morals could be prohibited by the National Government so far as it related to interstate commerce.

Much has been said here on the proposition that the goods themselves are not dangerous or injurious to commerce in any form. That is true; but neither is a lottery ticket. The danger of the lottery tickets to the morals of the people lay in what happened in the State from which the tickets were sent and what might happen in the State to which they were sent; and the Supreme Court held that the Congress had the right to prevent interstate traffic in what it considered an immoral thing.

Now, if you will take the language of Mr. Justice Harlan, found on page 357 of volume 188 of the Supreme Court Reports, and wherever you find the words "lottery tickets" substitute the words "child-made goods," I think you will not have very much doubt that the power exists, if that decision is upheld by the court in the future. Here is what the court said:

As a State may, for the purpose of guarding the morals of its own people, forbid all sales of lottery tickets within its limits, so Congress, for the purpose of guarding the people of the United States against the widespread pestilence of lotteries, and to protect the commerce which concerns all the States, may prohibit the carrying of lottery tickets from one State to another. In legislating upon the subject of the traffic in lottery tickets as carried on through interstate commerce, Congress only supplemented the action of those States, perhaps all of them, which for the protection of the public morals prohibited the drawing of lotteries, as well as the circulation and sale of lottery tickets within their respective limits.

Now, I repeat that wherever you find the words "lottery ticket," strike it out and put "child-made goods," and you will find a plain argument for the constitutionality of this law. It is true that goods made by child labor are not in themselves injurious, but the thing that is being aimed at is the evil that arises from child labor. Your law must not be arbitrary as to the subject matter dealt with. But plainly in this case it is not. Now, as I have said, there was nothing that hurt interstate commerce in the pieces of paper, the lottery tickets themselves, but what hurt the morals of the people lay back of that. In my judgment, the only question, if the Lottery decision is to be followed, is this: Whether Congress in the exercise of this power has exercised it in a reasonable way touching a subject matter clearly involving the morals of the people.

Much has been said about the Adair case. The Adair case said that it was not constitutional for Congress to pass a law making it a criminal offense against the United States for a carrier engaged in interstate commerce to discharge an employee simply because he belonged to a union. It held that law unconstitutional because it violated the fifth amendment, and it interfered with the right of contract. Under that decision the States themselves under their police powers could not have done what there was undertaken. But every State has the power to regulate the employment of child labor. No one questions that, and the very argument made by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WATSON] that such right was the test, when applied here upholds the constitutionality of this law.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. HARDY. Taking the same liberty in the lottery-ticket case, if you strike out the words lottery ticket wherever it occurs and insert in lieu of it the words nonunion-made goods, then you can prohibit——

Mr. SHERLEY. I get the gentleman's question.

Mr. HARDY. Let me finish my question.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I get the gentleman's question and I will answer it. Congress can not arbitrarily declare that something affects the morals of the people and therefore pass a law prohibiting it. There must be in the subject matter dealt with that which fairly warrants the conclusion that it does affect the morals of the people.

But I say to you that no court of the land, in my judgment, is going to say, when the Congress of the United States declares that the question of child labor is one involving the morals of the people, that it has arbitrarily decided and therefore its action is beyond its power. Therein is the difference between the matter passed on in the Adair case and the question here.

Mr. HARDY. But whenever sentiment gives way——

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman's judgment that sentiment is the controlling thing he is entitled to. I say to you that these things are naturally progressive, and as the world moves it learns that some things are immoral to-day that were not so considered before. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky to disfigure the bill by striking out the last word. Mr. Chairman, all legislation is evolution. That which is suggested to-day may make an impression to-morrow, may receive favorable consideration from many the next day, and may be enacted into legislation the day after—speaking of days as spaces of time. It was only a few days ago that the people commenced to see the grave danger to the race by the employment of young children in large factories. It was a danger which had not existed before, but in the main became one of grave importance. The States have taken the matter up and have legislated in behalf of the children in the States, but the State that refuses to legislate can send the products of its labor into another State which can not refuse to receive it.

There must be power somewhere in our dual form of Government to exercise control of everything which affects us as human beings. That which can not be exercised by the State, in the main, is wisely left so that it can be exercised by the General Government. Where the State itself can not refuse to receive the goods which ought not to be shipped, the power of the General Government, under the common clause of the Constitution, steps in, and we have the power to say, "Your State may make what it pleases, but you can not transmit it across the State line to another State which does not desire to receive it."

This legislation, as I say, is evolution. We have reached the point where it comes before us. We must determine whether we will do our share to preserve the life, the environment, the education, the possibilities of the child, and also the equalities of the States. I believe that the Republicans, in the main, will now, as ever, favor this righteous and humane legislation.

[Applause on the Republican side.] And while on these subjects of grave and great importance there is always a division on the Democratic side, which splits up their party, I hope that we will be true to our traditions, and that the great mass of the Republicans here will stand for these rights and the progressive legislation which can not be enacted without our vote. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "States," insert a comma and the words "or any foreign country."

In line 9, after the word "States," insert the following: "or in any foreign country."

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this bill does not relate to foreign commerce, but is expressly and exclusively devoted to American commerce and that the amendment is not germane. This point was ruled upon last year. This is the same bill.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair recollects, the ruling a year ago was on a bill similar to this, applying to local interstate commerce, and the Chair held then that an amendment of this character was not in order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the Chair did hold that with respect to a bill pertaining to goods made by convict labor, but it was suggested in the course of the debate that this amendment would be germane in the consideration of a bill of this kind affecting child labor.

If the Chair will bear with me for a few moments, I would like to speak upon the point of order. For some years efforts have been made in the course of legislation, notably with respect to tariff bills and the convict-labor-made-goods bill, to introduce a provision, which, as there was an effort to protect the labor within the United States, would also protect the labor of the United States from unfair competition from abroad. When the convict-labor bill came up in March, 1914, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] offered an amendment providing that the provisions of the bill as against convict-labor goods shipped between the States should apply also as against foreign child labor. A point of order was made against the amendment by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS]. It was debated for some time, when, after the proponents of the bill had suggested that such an amendment would be proper when a child-labor bill proper came up for consideration, the point of order was held to be well taken. It was only after a quite general discussion that the Chair did sustain the point of order.

Out of the mouths of the gentlemen who advocated the bill to prevent the interstate shipment of convict-made goods, however, came the suggestion that an amendment as to foreign goods should hold over until the then Palmer bill, now the Keating bill, should come up in the House. So I contend, Mr. Chairman, that the conditions are entirely different from what they were then, inasmuch as the gentlemen advocating the passage of the convict-labor bill admitted they were ready to protect the child labor of the United States against unfair labor abroad when the question should come up under a child-labor bill. If the Chair will permit me, I will read from the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN], a member of the committee. He said, and the following discussion ensued:

I hold in my hand a bill introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Palmer] to prevent interstate commerce in products of child labor, and for other purposes. Now, it seems from the remarks that have been made here to-day that we are almost unanimously in favor of protecting the children from being exploited for profit in the manufacturing industries of the country. This bill would be a special act, for the reason that it equalizes the proposition throughout the United States, and to this bill, it would seem to me, the amendment that is being considered here to-day could be applied, and treat the child-labor question alike in this country as well as in foreign countries. It could not be said then that we were discriminating against any country in regard to the matter. And if the feeling is so unanimous here, and we are in favor of legislation of this sort, it seems to me after the Labor Committee gets through with its hearings on this question we could get a measure like this up by unanimous consent and be able to pass it in the near future and not load the present bill down with an amendment the utility of which is questioned.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I do.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman think the Palmer child-labor bill would be effective as between the States, and that we could prohibit the transportation of child-made goods from one State to another?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I will say to the gentleman that, in my judgment, if he wants my judgment, which probably will not amount to much to the gentleman, as I am not a lawyer, if the Federal Government have such right to legislate in regard to interstate commerce I do not see where the Constitution puts limits on it.

I voted for the amendment of my colleague [Mr. MANN] the other day, and the only objection that I heard to it was that it might be successfully attacked as to its constitutionality. I have advised with lawyers, who say it was constitutional, and I do not agree with those who thought it could be attacked successfully in that way.

Mr. MOORE. If such a law were effective as between the States, barring child-made goods, why would it not be competent to pass a law here barring the importation of goods made by children abroad?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I did not catch that question.

Mr. MOORE. If we are capable of passing a law that would be effective preventing the shipment of child-made products from one State to another, why are we not competent to pass a law to prevent the admission into the United States of child-made products from foreign countries?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I endeavored to make it plain that I was in favor of an amendment of that sort, or an addition of that sort being attached to this child-labor bill of Mr. Palmer's, but do not think it properly applies to the bill under consideration.

The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS], chairman of the committee, and others entered into the discussion, the trend of which, I think, could be fairly interpreted as telling us to wait with this amendment protecting the labor of the United States against child labor in foreign countries until this child-labor bill came up, and that then it would be in order. In other words, they were favorable to the proposition, but they thought that tacking it on to the convict-labor bill would interfere with its passage. The amendment, therefore, is in order now

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire merely to make one suggestion. The authority of statements made by gentlemen during the course of a discussion I do not think would be sufficient to warrant the Chair in ruling upon this proposition. The rule is very plain with regard to the germaneness of questions, at least as to this. It reads that no proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under amendment. Here we have under the terms of this bill a proposition for the regulating solely of interstate commerce. This is a proposition not in any manner relating to interstate commerce, but a proposition to load down this bill with an endeavor to regulate foreign commerce. These two powers are entirely separate under the Constitution, and certainly are separate here. Under that rule we have this decision that in questions of this kind two subjects are not necessarily germane because they are related, and in Fifth Hinds, page 5841, it was expressly decided that to a bill relating to commerce between the States an amendment relating to commerce within the several States was not germane. Certainly if that be true it can not be considered that the proposition here to regulate foreign commerce can be held germane to a proposition enacted solely for the purpose of the regulation of interstate commerce.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, the most serious question about this measure that confronts the House is not our desire to regulate child labor, for I suppose we all share that in common within certain limits, but the grave question that confronts you and me in the consideration of this bill is the obligation we took when sworn in as Members of the House to support the Constitution of the United States. I do not think there has ever been a bill presented to this body that more clearly, directly, and boldly undertakes to violate the Constitution of the United States and the reserved rights of the various States than this particular measure. I challenge the advocates of the bill to cite one case on all fours with it that has been passed upon during the last 125 years by our Supreme Court which will uphold their contention, to wit, the right of the Federal Government, through an act of Congress, to go inside the individual States and regulate and control their manufactures and method of production.

Will it be argued here that the Federal Congress would have a right to pass a law providing that nobody in the United States under 16 years of age should work, or that they should only work eight hours a day or for not less than $3 a day? The merest tyro would say no; that that could not be done. Then, if that is the case, this whole bill is an attempted legislative fraud on the Constitution in an effort to hang onto the interstate-commerce clause of that instrument the power to regulate manufacture and production wholly within a State. I want you gentlemen from States which have laws on child labor to bear in mind that this bill is not aimed alone at the few remaining States which have not come up to the standard arbitrarily set in the bill. It is aimed at your State as well, and will set aside all your laws and turn over to the Federal authorities the administration of child-labor laws.

I would almost risk my reputation, whatever it may be, as a lawyer in saying that the Supreme Court will not hesitate in declaring this bill void; but should it by any possibility become a law, remember that this law is not aimed at the four States that have not yet brought their laws up to what this committee thinks they ought to do, but it is aimed at every one of the States which has child-labor laws, because the sponsors of this bill say you do not execute your laws properly, and they propose to take charge and send their agents and spies into every factory in your State to see that this law is executed according to their notion; not according to the laws of your State, because it is my opinion that if this bill passes and becomes a law all of your State statutes are wiped out, and Congress takes charge of the whole subject of child labor and will administer the law exclusively. So do not get the false idea that it is aimed at only four States. If it were aimed at only four States, and it is admitted that those States are making rapid progress, that it is only a question of a few years when they will come up to the standard by this committee, what is the use of Congress undertaking to pass a bill through this House in order to coerce those four remaining States to adopt the standard set by this bill? That is not the only object. It is for the purpose of turning over to a bureau here in Washington your entire domestic child-labor internal affairs, which will employ an army of Federal officers to administer your affairs around your factories and manufacturing plants. I do not defend young child labor in factories or defend girl work under the age of 16. For that matter, I wish no woman or child had to work, but in my country we have a lot of widows who are poor and depend upon the labor of their children 13 years old and over for support and a living.

My experience is that if you let a boy grow up to 16 years of age doing nothing except going to school for four months in a year, he is not of much account after that time, because he has not been taught anything by which he can earn a living. Who is the best judge of conditions surrounding working people? Do you think the Federal Congress—do you think a Federal committee is the best judge of how you should govern your purely internal domestic affairs? Has it not been left to the States under our Constitution for the last 125 years to pass on all of those things? Why, if this bill is constitutional, there is no use hereafter of having any amendments to the Constitution of the United States. You can regulate suffrage; you can provide that no citizen of a State shall ride in interstate commerce if his State does not permit every male, able-bodied citizen over 21 years of age to vote. You can regulate divorce and everything that has heretofore been the subject of domestic concern. Do you think you can regulate marriage, and provide that only persons married in accordance with a Federal standard should ride on an interstate train? I have no doubt but that my friends who are advocating this bill will say yes, and yet the Supreme Court, in the case of Andrews against Andrews, plainly said that Congress has no power over divorce or marriage; that that is a matter exclusively for the States. If this bill is constitutional, then there are no State rights, and State sovereignty is gone forever.

About six or seven years ago we had this very matter before Congress, and it was being pressed by the National Child Labor Committee and others. This question was up before the Committee on Appropriations, on which the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and other Members of this House were serving. They had their doubts about its constitutionality, and, not being lawyers, referred this question to the Committee on the Judiciary, of which Judge Jenkins was then the chairman. At that time such distinguished men as Mr. Birdsall, Mr. Charles E. Littlefield, Judge R. W. Parker, once chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and a Member of this House, Mr. De Armond, Mr. Sterling, of the present House, and others were members of that committee. They reported unanimously on the power of Congress to regulate child labor, and I will give only some excerpts from Judge Jenkins's report. Here is one of them:

> Therefore it plainly follows that Congress can not even exercise any jurisdiction or authority over women and children employed in the manufacture of products for interstate-commerce shipment; and certainly it will not be claimed by the foremost advocate of a centralized government that Congress can exercise jurisdiction or authority over women and children engaged in the manufacture of products for intrastate shipment.

I quote further from that report:

> Certainly there is no warrant in the Constitution for the thought or suggestion that Congress can exercise jurisdiction and authority over the subject of woman and child labor. If those performing such labor are abused and conditions are such that the same should be improved, it rests for the States to act. The failure of the States to act will not justify unconstitutiona action by Congress. * * *
> In fact, it is not a debatable question. It would be a reflection upon the intelligence of Congress to so legislate. It would be casting an unwelcome burden upon the Supreme Court to so legislate. The agitation of such legislation produces an uneasy feeling among the people and confuses the average mind as to the power of Congress and the power of the States. The lives, health, and property of the women and children engaged in labor is exclusively within the power of the States, originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to Congress.

The report was concurred in by every member of that committee.

> The committee is of the opinion, therefore, that Congress has no jurisdiction or authority over the subject of woman and child labor and has no authority to suppress the abuses in such labor or the amelioration of conditions surrounding the employment of such laborers.

Now, ordinarily that would end the matter, and it did end it, as for about seven years it was not agitated again. Judge Jenkins has been gathered to his fathers, Judge D'Armond has passed away, and the other members of that committee have gone, except Messrs. PARKER, STERLING, and HENRY. Now we are again asked to undertake to do the same thing that was undertaken then, when it was unanimously declared unconstitutional by the great law committee of the House.

Gentlemen, this House is asked to attempt to do by indirection what every man in this House will agree can not be done directly. If this bill be constitutional, you can regulate not only the hours of labor of children and men and women but you can regulate their pay. You can regulate the question of whether or not manufactured articles shall be shipped in interstate commerce if they are not made by union labor. You can regulate every internal affair that for 100 years has been left to the States of this Union to regulate and control.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. ADAMSON. I desire to ask the gentleman if the same rule of reasoning could not prevent boys from raising cotton and working in the fields?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, yes; if this bill is constitutional, Congress can provide that no cotton picked in whole or in part by a child under 14 or 16 years of age shall be shipped in interstate commerce, just as the arbitrary will of Congress may dictate.

Mr. ADAMSON. And on the same line of argument you could prohibit all children from working and make vagabonds of all the coming generation?

Mr. WEBB. Yes. If this bill is constitutional there are no more rights left to the States at all, if Congress wants to take them away. You can regulate everything, and there is no use hereafter in undertaking to have a constitutional amendment for suffrage, divorce, or anything else. As Rousseau says, whenever you arrogate to one central government all the powers concerning the purely domestic and internal affairs of the people, which have always been left and are still left to the States to administer, then our Government will fall of its own weight. There have been other Republics besides ours, but there never has been a Republic balanced like ours with dual State and Federal sovereignty—the sovereignty of the Federal Government within its sphere and the sovereignty of the State governments within their spheres. The sovereignty of the State government has always been recognized to have the control of all conditions which affect the morals and health of the people.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WEBB. In one moment. It has been decided by the Supreme Court—Adair against United States—that any rule prescribed for the conduct of interstate commerce, in order to be within the competency of Congress, under the power to regulate commerce among the States, must have some real or substantial relation to or connection with the commerce regulated. Commerce does not begin until manufacture ends. Congress attempted a few years ago to say that a railroad company could not dismiss a man because he was a member of a labor union, and the court, in the case of Adair against United States, decided that whether a man did or did not belong to a union had nothing to do with the regulation of commerce at all, and declared the statute void and unconstitutional. So, gentlemen, I submit that the question whether a child is 14 years and 1 day old or 13 years 11 months and 29 days old has nothing to do with the regulation of commerce. No; it is boldly stated by this committee that it is not the purpose of this bill to regulate commerce, but to regulate child labor. Every man in this House knows, whether he be lawyer or layman, that that has always been left to the State and such power can not be usurped by the Federal Government. I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it not a fact that the pure food and drug act prohibited shipment in interstate commerce of adulterated and misbranded foods?

Mr. WEBB. I am glad my friend asked that question. The only line of demarcation the Supreme Court has made in the control of Congress over interstate commerce is to give Congress the power to prohibit the shipment of an article that is deleterious or harmful in its nature.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman state how a misbranded article is necessarily deleterious or harmful?

Mr. WEBB. It is fraudulent.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman recall——

Mr. WEBB. If you would provide that manufacturers should brand all articles they make by child labor, maybe you could do that as a regulation of commerce, but you can not exclude from interstate commerce such clean, healthful articles on the pretense that you have power over commerce, when really you are undertaking to legislate on the hours of labor and ages of the laborer.

Mr. Chairman, the object of this bill, as shown by the report of the committee, is to regulate child labor. The alleged power we have for regulating it is supposed to be the commerce clause of the Constitution. If we have the power to regulate child-labor in the United States under this bill, and if it is immoral to receive goods made by child labor inside the United States, why not let us go further and say that it is immoral for the people of the United States to receive and consume goods made by child labor anywhere. The amendment is certainly germane to the same subject, to wit, the regulation of child labor.

I can not understand why, if it is competent for this Congress, having this question before it, to legislate on child labor, we can not legislate on all child labor, wherever child labor is used, especially if child-labor-made goods come within the confines of the United States from foreign countries. If we refuse to allow American manufacturers to employ child labor in their manufactories, why should foreign child-made goods be allowed to be introduced in this country? "Morals is morals" everywhere.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. ADAMSON. A good many foreign countries have less success in raising men and women than we have in the Southern States.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the regulation under which they claim this power is a police regulation looking to the protecting of children. As I understand it, what they are striking at is not the shipment from one State to another, but it is the actual work performed in the factory, cannery, or other establishment, by children under a certain age. Now, why should it be a greater crime to say that an article manufactured under those conditions should not be shipped into another State than if it were shipped out of the United States? It is the manufacturing of the article in which they claim the injury consists, and not the transportation of it. Therefore, if we have the power to regulate the shipment of an article from one State to another, certainly we have the right to regulate the shipment of the article from one State through another State and out of the borders of the United States. What this bill seeks to do, Mr. Chairman, as I stated before, is not to regulate the transportation of the article, but it seeks to regulate the manufacture of the article, and it only aims at the transportation of the article in order to prevent its manufacture. Therefore, as it seems to me, this amendment which was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is but going a step further in the regulation of the production of the article, that the Government has the same right, and this bill should be amended to that extent, and if enacted it should govern, if it is the wisdom of this House, just as much the shipment internationally as it should shipments between the States. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGSDALE. I will.

Mr. LINTHICUM. If the amendment is inserted, will the gentleman vote for the bill?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I would not vote for the bill with or without it; but I say this, Mr. Chairman, that certainly the United States Government should not put itself up to maintain a high moral position in order to regulate interstate commerce, and then say that the same position on morality should not obtain to international shipments. [Applause.] I say, Mr. Chairman, that if it is wrong for the United States Government to permit the great transportation arteries to be used to transport articles of this character between the States, then it is equally wrong to take the ships that sail the high seas, that are under our flag, under powers that we give them, protected on the seas by our fleets, and transport them to other countries.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. Would it not be just as immoral to import lottery tickets from abroad as from one State to another?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Absolutely; as my friend, with his usual good judgment, states so pertinently. Mr. Chairman, another thing: It seems to me the United States Government is not seeking to regulate the importation of articles manufactured by children abroad, but we could not in decency attempt to do that, Mr. Chairman, if we permitted our own articles to be exported abroad manufactured under those conditions. If it is a moral question to be controlled by the legal proposition, the position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is well taken, and it seems to me that there could be no question as to the legality of this amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, the subject matter of this bill is the elimination from the Congress of the United States of goods manufactured by child labor. It is to shut out from all commerce of the United States goods of that character. Now, I respectfully submit that it is germane to this subject, which is the exclusion of a certain kind of goods, for this House to consider an amendment that goods shall not be put in commerce coming from, for instance, Canada, and from inside the United States.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I understand this bill, if enacted into law, prohibits goods made by child labor in one State from being transported to and sold in another State. Some say this is done to preserve the children; others say it is to protect the States that prohibit child labor from competition with the products of child labor in States that do no prohibit the same.

There is nothing in this bill that prohibits States employing child labor from shipping their products to any foreign country in the world, nor is there anything in the bill which prohibits the world from shipping into the United States and selling therein, in competition with goods made in States of the United States where child labor is prohibited, goods made by child labor in such foreign countries.

The proposed legislation is sought to be justified under the Constitution, which provides that "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign countries." If the bill is enacted into law, it seems to me that the competition with foreign countries which employ child labor is much more serious than the shipment of the products of the few States which do not prohibit child labor into other States. So that this amendment, in my judgment, is in order. It seems to me that the bill should be amended so as to protect the United States against the child labor of the world.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard for a moment on the point of order, especially on the question which has just been brought up by the last two speakers. The gentleman correctly says one of the great purposes of this bill is to control and prohibit a moral wrong. That moral wrong consists of the production of goods by children under conditions that are deleterious to health and to morals and the peace of society. That moral wrong occurs at the place of production of the goods. There is another equally important element connected with the prohibition of child-made goods, and that is the economic wrong. That economic wrong occurs at the point of consumption or at the point of sale, where really the goods are coming in competition with the labor of adults who are supporting families and who are supposed to have an adequate wage for that purpose and with the goods of manufacturers who are working under conditions of humane organization of their departments.

But the gentlemen have confused the two questions of the moral and economic wrong. This bill can not deal with the moral wrong, if such there be, of child labor in foreign countries. It is not intended for any such purpose. It can, however, put the States of this Union upon an equality, so far as moral conditions are concerned, by providing that goods manufactured under immoral conditions in one State can not be sent to another State, but must be used in the States where they are manufactured. Now, the gentlemen have confused the economic results of the bill with the moral results of the bill, and the point of order is well taken that this particular amendment, seeking to reach moral conditions beyond the jurisdiction of this country, is not germane to the present bill, however desirable it might be to have it effected by legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. It will be understood that the Chair has nothing to do with the merits of the feasibility of extending this act to foreign commerce. His province is to determine whether or not the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is germane to the bill now pending. The House is familiar with the principle that to one specific subject another specific subject is not in order. This has been held in the House time and again. It seems to the Chair that most of the gentlemen who have argued in favor of this proposition have discussed the power of Congress to regulate both interstate and foreign commerce rather than the question of whether a proposition regulating foreign commerce is germane to a bill regulating interstate commerce. Two subjects are not necessarily germane to each other because they are related. The Chair believes that this is a bill to regulate child labor in interstate commerce, and, therefore, that an amendment proposing to extend it to foreign commerce is a different matter, and is not in order. Therefore the point of order is sustained.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 5, after the word "States," by inserting the words "or imported from any foreign country."

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order on that. I think that can be disposed of without any further argument.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not care to hear, unless the gentleman from Pennsylvania wants to make an argument.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I think this is clearly interstate commerce now. The amendment relates to goods within this country. It does not relate to goods made in any foreign countries, except as they are already in this country. It applies to goods that have arrived here and are going into interstate commerce. We are trying to protect the workmen of the United States against unfair child labor abroad. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman is trying to protect the Republican Party and not the workmen of the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I quote the gentleman last year against the gentleman this year. He was in favor of some such provision as this then.

Mr. LEWIS. I make the point of order, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will observe that the committee has limited this bill to child-labor goods produced in the United States. The child-labor goods produced in foreign countries are another matter. If the gentleman will turn to the RECORD of a year ago, he will find where the Speaker overruled the Committee of the Whole on the same identical proposition. In that case the Speaker held that where the committee had limited the application of the bill to the products of one kind of labor, a proposition to extend it to the products of another kind of labor was not germane. The Chair thinks he ought to follow the ruling of the Speaker where the Speaker was sustained by the House.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the Chairman permit an interrogation?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would not the effect of the ruling of the Chair as to previous amendments and also as to this, if the Chair should sustain the point of order, be that the shipment, interstate, of goods made within the United States would be prohibited, while the shipment, interstate, of goods made in foreign countries would not be prohibited?

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is asking the Chair something he could determine for himself. It is the province of the Chair to follow the rules of this House as they have been laid down by precedent. The committee has limited the scope of this bill to the products of one class of labor, namely, child labor, in the United States. The gentleman from Pennsylvania seeks to extend its operation to another class of labor. It is immaterial whether the Chair is or is not in favor of the proposition. The present Speaker of the House ruled on this identical question over a year ago, and the Chair feels constrained to follow the ruling of the Speaker, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the decision of the committee?

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 103, noes 42.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can get the yeas and nays when the bill is in the House.

So the ruling of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I offer an amendment.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 1, line 7, after the word "any" and before the word "mill," by inserting the words "farm, plantation, waterway."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, evidently this is a germane amendment, because the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] has not raised the point of order against it. It is such an amendment as I do not believe I am personally in sympathy with [laughter], although it is an amendment, being germane, which gives me the opportunity to say that, while I respect him highly, as much as I do any man in the House, the rulings made by the Chair a little while ago are clearly in the line of the encouragement of child labor in foreign countries as against the conditions that hold in the United States, where we are passing drastic child-labor laws.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] seems to think there is some politics in this suggestion. There has been some politics in this suggestion for some time, but it has emanated very largely from the other side. This side, so far as I have knowledge, has persistently endeavored to protect the labor of the United States as against unfair foreign conditions. We undertook to do this when a low-tariff law was passed in this House in October, 1913.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not just now. This question was raised when a low-tariff law was passed against our protest, which brought this country, in an industrial sense, to its lowest possible ebb.

We are recovering somewhat from that condition now, due to the unfortunate war in Europe, which gives excuse to gentlemen on the other side to play about as much politics now in wriggling out of the hole into which they got themselves when they passed the low-tariff law, as they are entitled to. They did not permit us to put an antidumping clause in the tariff law, which, I think, they are themselves now about to suggest that we assist them in doing. They did not permit us to put into the tariff law a provision limiting imports from foreign countries where goods were produced under working conditions and hours of labor that must compete with the goods produced in the United States under more favorable conditions. They knocked out the eight-hour provision as against foreign labor which we wanted to insert in the low-tariff law.

Then the convict-labor bill came along, and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] suggested what he was going to do for the working people of this country. He favored restrictions on the shipment in interstate commerce of goods made by convicts in the United States, but when we offered a provision proposing that we should extend protection to the people of the United States as against the convict-made goods of Europe the gentleman winced and claimed, as he claims now, that we were playing politics. We were told then to wait for the foreign child-labor question until the child-labor bill came up, but now, when the child-labor bill is up, they do not want us to protect the American end of it. We have asked that the producers of the United States be protected against unfair child labor in Europe, whose products, as we learn from the imports, are coming into the ports of the United States along with other free products to such an extent that the Treasury of the United States is being impoverished for want of revenues. Apparently our friends on the other side are only endeavoring to put a thumbscrew upon some of the Southern States which up to this time have not passed child-labor laws such as some other States of the Union now have.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WEBB. Is it in order to move to strike out words in the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move——

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard before the Chair makes a ruling along those lines, because the Chair will find a long line of precedents in rulings by Speaker Carlisle and Speaker Reed and several other distinguished Speakers holding that where the effect of striking out words is to change the scope of the bill it is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon reflection, the Chair thinks the gentleman from Kentucky is correct. The Chair was in error in making his answer. An amendment is now pending before the House. If no one desires to speak on that amendment——

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to discuss the bill for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I was not in the House during the general discussion on this bill, and therefore I avail myself of this opportunity to say a few words under the five-minute rule. I believe I have always voted in the interest of labor since entering Congress and shall vote for this bill. But before doing so I want to talk to the Members of this House in reference to its effect if we do not increase the tariff duties on cotton, woolen, and knit goods.

This past summer I visited cotton and woolen mills in Japan and China and made a personal investigation. I examined a cotton mill in Kobe, employing 9,000 Japanese girls and boys; a spinning mill between Yokohama and Tokyo, employing 4,500; a woolen mill employing 1,500 at Tokyo. Then I personally inspected a cotton mill at Shanghai, China, and another employing 4,500 Chinese boys at Wuchang, 600 miles in the interior of China, on the Yangste River. I found in Japan they were paying from 8 cents to 15 cents a day for 11 hours' work in cotton, woolen, spinning, and knitting mills, and in China they were paying boys 5 cents a day for 11 hours' work. There are 525,000 Japanese women and girls in the textile mills of Japan alone and 66,000 men and boys.

Now, this bill is going to result in increased cost in the production of cotton, woolen, and knit goods. You will have to admit this. We are going to pass legislation which will result in increasing the cost of producing American cotton, woolen, and knit goods at a time when our tariff on the importation of these same foreign-made goods is lower than ever before in the history of this country.

Now, we sold $30,000,000 of American-made cotton goods in China a few years ago. I think the report of the Secretary of Commerce will show that last year we sold $1,200,000 in China, where we had formerly sold $30,000,000.

Now, the lowest wages paid in the knitting and cotton mills in the district I represent—and there are 2 large cotton plants and 15 knitting mills—is 50 and 60 cents per day for beginners, and when they understand their work their wages are increased to $1 and as high as $1.50 per day. Our mills must compete in the foreign markets with mechanics, with employees, with the same kind of modern, up-to-date machinery, who are working for 5 or 8 or 15 cents a day, as against 50 and 60 cents and $1 and $1.50 a day.

What do our foreign returns show on cotton-goods importations? They show that in 1913 and 1914 there was imported into the United States and into the Philippine and Hawaiian Islands, where our present low-tariff law applies, $105,000,000 of foreign-made cotton goods; $25,000,000 more than we sold abroad, and we produce 60 per cent of all the raw cotton in the world.

This bill is going to injure seriously this great industry in the South, unless Congress increases the tariff duty on imported cotton, woolen, and knit goods.

If we will increase the tariff, well and good; but if not, then look out for a very large increase in the sale of European and Japanese cotton, woolen, and knit goods in the United States, and the closing of many American mills or the reduction of the hours of work or wages in our textile mills.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] offers an amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, as I do not intend to support the amendment I have offered, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw it and present another one.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. We have had three or four speeches in favor of this amendment, and I think we ought to be permitted to say something in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a question of unanimous consent pending. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HARDY. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. HARDY. I object just in order to be heard myself, Mr. Chairman, not that I have any objection to the withdrawal of his amendment. It appears to me that we see very plainly the purpose of his amendment. If the protectionists could secure the injection of this amendment into this law they would need no more protection, or high tariff, or anything else to secure to the manufacturers of this country a monopoly of the markets of this country. As a matter of fact, if you applied the principle of this bill to goods imported from abroad there would not be an opportunity for the importation of any goods from abroad or the collection of any revenue from the importation of such goods. The gentleman last addressing the House [Mr. AUSTIN] has illustrated how all Japanese goods would be excluded under the provisions of this bill, if it applied to foreign-made goods; and I doubt not that the importation of goods from every country of Europe would be likewise excluded by this bill if extended as proposed by the amendment. The truth is the gentleman from Pennsylvania illustrates very clearly that he is not so much interested in child labor as he is in protection. He is like the merchant of Venice. It is a case of my ducats and my daughter, of protection and child labor; but which he thinks the most of is not hard to tell. In the innermost recesses of my soul I think he cares more for protection, and if he could so amend this bill as to provide that no goods made abroad in the making of which child labor, so called, entered would be admitted into the United States he would exclude all foreign-made goods. And yet this bill offers the anomaly of excluding from the commerce of one State goods made in a sister State, while admitting goods of the same class and character when made abroad. That fact alone ought to condemn this bill.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close at the end of 10 minutes.

Mr. VARE. Reserving the right to object, I have an amendment I should like to offer.

Mr. LEWIS. Is there objection to closing debate in 15 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Maryland to ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I object.

Mr. HARRISON. I have an amendment I desire to offer.

Mr. MANN. Let us see if it is possible to reach an agreement, because we are going to stay here and pass this bill.

Mr. LEWIS. I will withdraw the application at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina objects, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] knows very well that this is one of the bills that has been introduced into this House for the purpose of injuring the South in its relation to the other States. Already in those matters in which transportation is involved, legislation has been enacted that has struck us very hard blows in the past. To-day, if the people of the South want to transport their raw or manufactured products to another State in the Union, they have lost absolute jurisdiction over any of the railroads transporting that product.

The people of the South to-day may want to transport their products by water into any other State, but, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania well knows, they labor under a disadvantage that has operated against them for years. To-day you can load two ships in the ports of Europe and send one to India and one to South Carolina and reload each one of those ships with cotton. You know that if these ships were not built in the United States the ship that comes from India can take the products from India and sell them in any port of the United States, while the ship that is loaded in South Carolina or at any other southern port can not take an American product and deliver it in any other State in the Union.

The iniquitous system of protection that the Republican Party has foisted on the people of the United States has stifled commerce between the States, and has laid a burden of expense in transportation under which the people of the South have suffered and the flag driven from the seas. For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to further legislation that restricts our rights, that puts a further burden upon us, and that interferes with our right to create, to manufacture, and to sell at will in the markets of this country and in the markets of the world that which we produce honestly and sell honestly and to take fair compensation for that which we produce and offer for sale.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "of," strike out "16" and insert in lieu thereof "19"; in line 10, strike out "14" and insert "18"; in line 11, strike out "14" and insert "18"; and, page 2, line 1, strike out "16" and insert "19."

Mr. LEWIS. I make the point of order on the proposed amendment that it does not deal with children. People 19 years of age are not children.

Mr. HARRISON. I should like to ask the gentleman if that is all he has to say in support of his point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, there appears much sentiment among the Members here in behalf of the children of the country. I concede to no Representative on this floor a greater interest in their health and welfare than I have. I think the States of this Union all should pass humane child-labor legislation. The agitation of this question in this country, as you know, grew out of the conditions in the mills and factories and treatment of little children in the towns and cities of the East. Conditions that called for rigid child-labor legislation. There you would find a mill or factory employing little children whose health, intellect, and body were weakened and impaired.

These conditions forced State legislatures to pass appropriate child-labor legislation. The conditions I have briefly referred to do not obtain in the mills and factories of the South.

There are few factories in my State. Only one cotton mill in my district. The operator of that factory is for this legislation. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] knows him well, and that gentleman wrote me on yesterday that he favored this legislation. You will see, therefore, that all these operators are not opposed to this bill. He may be the exception, for he is a splendid man, patriotic and broad minded.

This question, therefore, does not affect me locally. My State legislature knows more about conditions there and is better enabled to pass appropriate legislation to meet those conditions than is the Federal Congress. Conditions in the mills and the factories of the South are splendid. If you should pass through the States of South and North Carolina, you would see these factories and mills erected on hills with ideal sanitation, and beautiful homes, schoolhouses, and churches built far apart.

There is no comparison between the conditions that obtain in the South and the conditions that did obtain in other parts of the Union until recently respecting child labor.

Sirs, I am against the Federal Government exercising this power. It is a dangerous precedent and will, if passed, rise to plague many of you. But if you are sincere in your arguments for this legislation, if you really want to stop by Federal law the employment of children in the mills and factories and mines of the country, then vote for the amendment I have offered. It raises the limit and prevents the transportation of goods from without a State where the labor employed is younger than 19 and 18 years.

Now, vote for this amendment and back up your assertions by your actions.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think the age limit ought to be considerably raised.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the ages I suggest are sufficient.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has made a very eloquent appeal for the protection of children of 18 years in manufacturing establishments and 19 years in mines and quarries. The gentleman is blind to the fact that now in North Carolina children of 13, and maybe younger, are being worked 11 hours a day. He has not a word of condemnation for that; but instead comes in here and, while appealing to this House to assist him to safeguard those who are 18 or 19 years old, joins the enemies of the bill and endeavors to mutilate it.

That is the record the gentleman from Mississippi is making on the floor of this House. I am amazed that he of all men from the South should take such an attitude, because he belongs to the newer generation in the Southern States. Does the gentleman know that the testimony before our committee demonstrated that the children affected by this bill, the children who work in the cotton mills of the South, are Anglo-Saxon? One cotton-mill owner boasted that only white children worked in his mill. Another witness testified that it was a common spectacle to see white children on their way to work in the mill passing black children on their way to school. I submit, as a friend of the South, Mr. Chairman, that there is one section of this country that needs this legislation more than any other section, and that section is south of the Mason and Dixon line. [Applause.]

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

Mr. MANN. That is not in order; there is an amendment pending. The gentleman, like myself, will have to wait until we have a vote.

Mr. HOWARD. I offer to amend by striking out the word "fourteen" and inserting the word "thirteen" in section 1.

Mr. MANN. That amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this is exhausted, and the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia is not in order.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia may be allowed to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 1, after the word "year," in line 10, by inserting "except during the periods of regular school vacations, work not to exceed eight hours in any one day."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I am heartily in favor of the purposes of this bill. I take it that the prime purpose of the bill is for the protection of the child. I am also interested in the further protection of the child, and I believe in strengthening this measure. If this bill becomes a law as it is, during the school vacation there will be an army of children in this country in enforced idleness. We were told yesterday by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] that in the city of New York there are 750,000 school children. I dare say of that number one-half of them by reason of this bill, if it passes without the amendment I propose, will be idle entirely during school vacation.

If there is any one thing that the children, especially the boys of this country, should be protected in, it is from idleness between the ages of 12 and 16 years. It is during that period that their habits for weal or for woe are made. It is the formative period of their character, and if they are educated along the lines of idleness they will be idlers during their entire lives. As I say, I am in favor of the purposes of this bill. I think it should be strengthened by adding an amendment something like this that I have offered, whereby the children during the period of vacation may find some kind of employment. In Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, and many of the Western States, where we have large canneries that can vegetables, pumpkin, beans, the work is done during the period of vacation, from the latter part of July to the latter part of September. The work is not hard, and these boys from 10 to 16 years of age can find remunerative employment.

I want to say that I expect if we took a vote of the men in this body and at the other end of the Capitol Building we would find that everyone of them found employment during that period and that it did not detract from them, but made them stronger and more useful men. There are many who absolutely need it; there are many poor men who are working hard to sustain their families; and there are many widows who are working hard at the washtub to sustain their families who are in favor of educating their children but want them to find some employment during school vacations to help sustain the family.

This great army of young children in the city of New York can not go into the country, and what exists there exists all over this land.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman know that the laws of New York and of Indiana and Illinois and of other States which the gentleman has mentioned all forbid the employment of children within the ages mentioned in this bill, and those exceptions are not given in the laws of those States?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It would not apply, I know, in the State of Indiana. I know that in Indiana children during the school vacations may work in these factories. I do not know whether it is true in the State of Illinois or not.

Mr. DENISON. Does not the law of Indiana forbid the employment of children of the same ages or within the ages fixed by this bill the whole year around?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; it does not.

Mr. DENISON. I think if the gentleman will refer to those laws he will find that he is mistaken. I have an abstract of the Indiana law in front of me. I am sure I am right about the law in Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana. As I was attempting to say a while ago when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] interrupted me, I presume that when my delegation votes on this measure I will be as lonesome as a martin on a fodder pole. I have heard a good deal said about the South and southern conditions, and they are no worse there than they were everywhere only a few years ago. I have tried to find a single reason why I should vote against this bill. I read all of the hearings and the argument made before the Committee on Labor by the distinguished and able gentleman from North Carolina, Ex-Gov. Kitchin. Then I read the argument of Dr. Parkinson, and after reading both of them my mind was still in doubt as to the constitutionality of this bill. I wavered; I could not arrive at any conclusion definitely as to whether it was constitutional or not. So I decided that I would give the benefit of the doubt as to the constitutionality of the measure to the innocent childhood of my State, and I am going to do it. The law in Georgia is not like the law in the Carolinas. Our age limit is two years higher. We have, as a rule, a lot of broad-minded, humane, and patriotic men engaged in the manufacture of cotton in our State. [Laughter.] The manufacturers of Georgia are not now attempting to wring gold out of the bodies of innocent little children. The strong arm of the State law protects them under the age of 14, and they do not work them under this age lawfully any more.

The astounding thing to me is that there is any necessity for this law anywhere. The mill owners testify themselves that only a very small percentage of their employees are children under 14 years of age. If this is true, the law we are debating will not harm a hair upon their heads. If it is not true, then this bill should unquestionably become a law.

We hear much about the mill owners and the poor widows, but they are not wholly to blame for child-labor conditions. In a great many cases trifling, no-account, drinking daddies are as much to blame for conditions in the South as they are in any other section of this country. They have large families—five, six, and seven children; they are not willing to make a living by the sweat of their faces, and they move their families to a mill town and put their innocent little children in pawn that they may live in idleness and ease, and there is not a man from the South or from any section of the country that does not know that that is true. [Applause.]

The other day the cotton manufacturers from my section came up here and said to the Ways and Means Committee: "We want you to join in with us in giving us protection for aniline dyes, that this particular industry may be conserved to the cotton manufacturers of the country. We need this protection to encourage the manufacture of dyestuffs in America." [Applause on the Republican side.] I say to these gentlemen: "Yes; if I believe the necessity exists for you to have protection upon analine dyes, I will vote for it." [Applause on the Republican side.] But I, in turn, say to those same gentlemen now that I believe that we need protection for the childhood of the South; that they may be granted that privilege which is the sweetest heritage of life—childhood days of play and physical development.

Mr. Chairman, we must protect and conserve their intellects; they must have a chance in life. We must protect them from designing and mercenary men engaged in business. We must protect them from worthless fathers and thoughtless mothers. We must educate them intellectually and morally. The ignorance of our people is our greatest weakness, and our greatest asset is our children—educated in mind, strong in body, clean in morals. Compulsory education, strict child-labor laws, in my humble judgment, are imperative in the making of a nation great. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to see that another mourner has come forward——

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I think debate on this particular amendment has been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. No one made the point of order, and the Chair recognized the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. KEATING. I make the point of order that debate is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 1, page 2, line 4, by adding at the end thereof the following paragraph:

"It shall be unlawful for any carrier of interstate commerce to transport or accept for transportation in interstate commerce the products of any mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment offered to it for transportation by any person, firm, or corporation which owns or operates such mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment, or by any officer, agent, or servant of said person, firm, or corporation, until the president, secretary, or general manager of such corporation, or a member of such firm, or the person owning or operating such mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment shall file with said carrier an affidavit setting forth that none of the products so offered have been produced, in whole or in part, by the labor of children under the age of 14 years, or by the labor of children between the ages of 14 and 16 years, who work more than eight hours in any one day, or more than six days in any one week, or after the hour of 7 o'clock p. m., or before the hour of 7 o'clock a. m.: Provided, however, That in lieu of the affidavit hereinbefore provided the president, secretary, or general manager of any corporation, or the member of any firm, or any person owning or operating any mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment, as aforesaid, may file with the Secretary of Labor a general affidavit setting forth that for the six months preceding the filing thereof in said mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment no children under the age of 14 years were employed in any capacity, and that no children between the ages of 14 years and 16 years, who have worked more than eight hours in any one day, or more than six days in one week, or after the hour of 7 o'clock p. m., or before the hour of 7 o'clock a. m., which general affidavit shall be renewed each six months thereafter. The form of said affidavits shall be prescribed by the board composed of the Attorney General, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor, as hereinafter provided."

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say at the beginning that this amendment is offered in good faith; that I am heartily in favor and always have been of legislation to prohibit the labor of children under these ages, and as a member of the legislature of my own State I had more or less to do with securing the enactment of similar legislation. I am firmly convinced, however, that some such amendment is necessary to make this legislation effective and capable of accomplishing the result which most of us really desire.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the trouble with the bill as it has been reported by the committee is not with its constitutionality—and I want to say in passing that I have been surprised to hear Members from the Southern States who yesterday voted for a roads bill appropriating money out of the Federal Treasury for purely local roads and bridges, raise that question against this measure, but the trouble I find with this bill is the difficulty of securing a conviction under its provisions. In the Keating bill, as originally introduced, in order to obtain a conviction the burden was upon the Government to prove not only that a child was found working in a manufacturing establishment under the age of 14 years, but that the labor of that particular child actually entered into the production of a commodity which was the subject of interstate commerce. The committee in its report has sought to meet this difficulty in section 2 of the bill now under discussion by making the fact of the employment of a child under 14 years of age or between 14 and 16 for more than eight hours prima facie evidence of a violation of this act.

The question naturally arises whether the making of an act which in itself may be perfectly innocent prima facie evidence of guilt is constitutional or wise; but assuming that it is constitutional and wise, it is only prima facie evidence. Let us suppose an actual case of a complaint under this bill if in its present form it becomes a law. The Government puts an inspector on the witness stand, who testifies that he has found a child working in some factory under 14 years of age, and the Government rests its case. The foreman of the factory then goes on the stand and testifies that the special kinds of goods which that child was working upon were intended for shipment, or were actually being shipped, to points entirely within that State. Then the Government is obliged to go forward and contradict that evidence by proving that those particular goods were intended to be shipped, or were actually being delivered for shipment, in interstate commerce, which it will be almost impossible to do. Now, Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered affords a way in which this bill can be enforced, and enforced practically every time, whether the Government is able to sustain the burden of proof just mentioned or not. It puts the responsibility upon the carrier as well as upon the producer and dealer, just as Congress has done in the Penal Code in regard to the transportation of immoral and obscene books and papers, in which cases it has placed the responsibility not only upon the shipper but also upon the carrier, and even upon the receiver.

Under the provisions of my amendment every shipment of goods in interstate commerce must be accompanied by an affidavit that the provisions of section 1 of this act have been complied with, and that no child labor has entered into the production of that particular commodity. Now in those States where child-labor legislation like this has been enacted by the State legislatures I have provided a remedy to do away with the inconvenience and burden of filing a separate affidavit with each individual shipment by providing that in place of it a general affidavit may be filed by any manufacturing concern with the Secretary of Labor, renewable every six months, setting forth that in that factory or that manufacturing establishment no child under 14 years of age has been employed in any capacity and that no child in that establishment between 14 and 16 years of age has been employed more than eight hours in any one day or more than six days in any one week, for the six months next preceding. Not only will this general affidavit be universally made use of by concerns in all of those States which have proper labor legislation, but also in the other States. On account of the inconvenience of filing a separate affidavit in the case of each shipment the temptation will be strong to file a general affidavit, and wherever such a general affidavit has been filed you can always get a conviction if the Government inspector finds a child working under 14 years of age or under the conditions forbidden by section 1 of the act, because in every such case the evidence is conclusive that a false affidavit has been filed. In short, if this amendment is adopted, the bill is not harmed. If the Government is able to sustain its heavy burden of proof, it is capable of being enforced.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, if, on the other hand, it is found difficult to obtain a conviction under the remainder of the bill, a conviction can always be obtained where a general affidavit has been filed under the provisions of the paragraph which I have moved to have added to the first section of the bill, by simply offering testimony that a single child has been employed in the factory or other manufacturing establishment under the age of 14 years, or has been employed between the ages of 14 and 16 years, for more than eight hours in any one day or more than six days in any one week, or after the hour of 7 o'clock in the afternoon or before the hour of 7 o'clock in the morning, for the reason that if this amendment is adopted I shall later offer an amendment to the penal provisions of section 6 of the bill imposing the same penalties for the making of a false affidavit as are imposed by that section for the violation of the other provisions of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, the permitting by the electorate of this country of the exploitation of child labor for the sake of financial gain, which has been going on to a greater or less extent for a quarter of a century, is in my opinion, next to the permitting for a much longer period of the institution of human slavery, the greatest crime against humanity of which the American Nation has been guilty, and for which some day it will have to answer before the bar of Divine Justice.

I must confess that I have always failed to understand how men calling themselves Christians have been willing to reap profits at the expense of the physical and mental well-being of the childhood of America. The Great Founder of Christianity, when He was upon this earth, was meek and gentle and spent His time going about doing good. He taught throughout His earthly ministry the great principle that love is the fulfilling of the law, and He came to establish upon earth the brotherhood of man. There were times, however, when He spoke in words of no uncertain meaning of the inevitable punishment of those who for selfish greed oppress the innocent and helpless. It was He who said: "Woe unto him who shall offend one of these little ones; it were better for that man if a millstone were hanged about his neck and he were drowned in the depths of the sea."

Mr. Chairman, every consideration of reason and justice demands the passage of this legislation, and it is for the sole purpose of making this legislation effective and of stamping out for all time this blot upon our Christian civilization that I have offered this amendment, and sincerely hope that it will be adopted and that the bill as amended will be enacted into law.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is now nearly 4 o'clock. We have read half of the first section of the bill. There are nine sections of this bill. Under the new rule of the House, which was adopted yesterday and for which most of the Members voted but for which I did not, consideration of this measure will automatically close at a fixed hour. If this bill is delayed this day until it is impossible to keep a quorum, and there is still a number of sections of the bill to be read, the bill will not be passed on next Wednesday in my opinion. The amendment now offered is in good faith, but many of the amendments which have been offered have been offered for the purpose of delay and filibuster. I think the time has nearly arrived when the gentleman in charge of the bill, in order to accommodate the mass of the membership of the House who do not care to be unduly inconvenienced in hearing speeches to which they do not desire to listen, ought to commence to move the bill along to its final disposition. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Georgia indulge the Chair just a moment?

Mr. ADAMSON. Of course. The gentleman from Georgia will indulge the Chair in anything.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wants to say that a good many gentlemen have asked to be recognized for the purpose of speaking on the bill, by offering to strike out the last word or for the offering of amendment. The Chair thinks the better rule is to recognize those gentlemen who have amendments which affect the bill and perfect it according to their views, and he will give recognition to those gentlemen in preference to pro forma amendments. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to cause any delay, nor have I very much to say. I thought it useless for the distinguished and eloquent gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] to announce that his amendment was in good faith, for considering the grotesque bill now before the committee it is not difficult for me to understand that some people can do anything in good faith, and if anything can be worse than the bill it must be the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts. But, Mr. Chairman, I rose for the purpose of corroborating a portion of the speech of my eloquent colleague from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD]. As to the part in which he confessed to having failed while he was solicitor general to convict vagrants I have no dispute with him; as to the part in which he boasted of the broad, high-minded, great, strong, good men and the beautiful and accomplished women in Georgia I proudly concur with him [applause]; but he deplored the degraded, desolate condition of the benighted Carolinas. I admit all the good things he says for Georgia. I believe the output shows on the average that she knows how to raise just as good men and women as Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, or Colorado. Comparisons are always odious, but the gist of this bill being to attend to somebody else's business because they can not attend to it themselves invites comparison.

Conditions of factory life and labor in Georgia are ideal. The factory communities are model villages. They have schools, churches, and libraries, all liquor, gambling, and all vice being strictly and effectively prohibited. We teach the children in Georgia to work, because an "idle brain is the devil's workshop; an idle hand the devil's best instrument." We teach them to work not always because their work is pecuniarily profitable or necessary for support of them or their family but in order to educate them in industry and economy and skill in production fully as important as teaching them languages, rhetoric, or mathematics. I have reason to state that some other States do as well and are unjustly and cruely maligned here.

Therefore I decline to indorse the balance of the speech of my colleague, which I understand to mean that, standing on this exalted pinnacle of self-sufficiency and ability, we deem it necessary to resort to the subterfuge of invoking and perverting the commerce clause of the Constitution to pick up poor benighted North Carolina and help her out of the dumps. I decline, either for Georgia or myself, to join either the Pharisees, who are professing to be "holier and better than thou," or the Shylocks, who propose, as some gentlemen here have openly and shamelessly argued, to equalize the conditions which God Almighty has made unequal throughout the different parts of the country. I want to say to those gentleman that their mistake lies in this, that they think it necessary for everybody to follow the same pursuits and to do the same things in every clime, which is contrary to nature and abnormal. There are things which men can do, each in his own section and under the peculiar conditions thereof, without trying to do violence to the instrumentalities of commerce in this country and the common sense and the decency and the equal rights of various parts of the country, and without reflecting upon the people of other States and insulting large sections of the country which bid fair by their progress to outstrip the localities and enterprises of the persons interested. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEWIS, Mr. PRICE, Mr. WEBB, and Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] rise?

Mr. LEWIS. I move that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed at 15 minutes after 4 o'clock.

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Is that motion debatable, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not debatable. The gentleman from Maryland moves that all debate to this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed at a quarter past 4 o'clock.

Mr. WEBB. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WEBB. That does not cut off the right to offer an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, no. This is simply limiting debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto to quarter after 4 o'clock.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WATSON] may be heard for three minutes on this motion.

Mr. MANN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] moves that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Maryland. I move to amend by striking out the words "quarter past 4."

Mr. LEWIS. I think that is not in order, sir.

Mr. MANN. We will agree to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] moves that the motion offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] be amended by striking out the words "quarter past 4." That would close debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto, but would not at this moment prevent offering amendments ad libitum.

Mr. DYER. Debate would be closed, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will that mean that gentlemen who have amendments to offer will be precluded from offering them?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair just said it would not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will it preclude debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has just said that it would.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I wish to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I renew the amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is recognized.

Mr. HEFLIN. I understood the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] to move that all debate close on the pending amendment at a quarter past 4 o'clock. It is now five minutes of 4. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] moves to strike out "quarter past 4."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] to the motion of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MANN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland as amended by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The gentleman from Mississippi will please wait until the Chair states the question.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Chair will allow me, I was on my feet when the Chair announced the vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS].

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 181, noes 10.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina demands tellers. Those in favor of taking the vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Only three gentlemen have arisen—not a sufficient number. The question is on agreeing to the motion offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] as amended by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VARE] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. VARE: Amend section 1 by inserting after the word "years," on line 1, page 2, the following: "who work more than eight hours in any one day or more than six days in any one week, or after the hour of 7 o'clock p. m., or before the hour of 11 o'clock a. m.; and each minor between the age of 14 and 16 years so employed shall, during the period of such employment, attend, for a period or periods equivalent to not less than six hours each week, a public school, during the usual public school term: Provided, That the school hours shall not be on Saturdays nor before 8 o'clock a. m. nor after 5 o'clock p. m. of any other day."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VARE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VARE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the amendment just considered.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

The Clerk read as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 5, page 1, the words "situated in the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, by striking out, in line 5, the words "situated in the United States."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order to the amendment, and I do it for this purpose: A moment ago in a hurry I made a statement to the House, which the Chair accepted, in which I think I was in error. I made the statement that a motion to strike out words would not be in order if it would have the effect of giving the bill a scope which could not be given by an affirmative amendment. I think that ought to be so, but in my haste I said just contrary to what was decided by the Speakers to whom I referred. I think I owe it to the House and to myself to make this statement. I will not press the point now, but some day I want to make that point plain.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I move in line 8, after the word "establishment," to strike out the word "situated," and in line 9, at the beginning of the line, the words "in the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, lines 8 and 9, by striking out the words "situated in the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 69.

Mr. WEBB and Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania demanded tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded. All those in favor of taking the vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Evidently a sufficient number; and the Chair appoints Mr. WEBB and Mr. KEATING as tellers.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the other side.

Mr. WEBB. Too late, Mr. Chairman. The Chair has already appointed tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is a little too late. The tellers have been appointed.

Mr. MANN. Very well. I am willing to stay a little longer while the gentlemen filibuster.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will take their places and gentlemen will pass between the tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 57, noes 101.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Amend by inserting on line 4, page 2, after the word "antemeridian," the words "or by the labor of children under 21 years of age who receive as compensation for their labor less than $2 per day."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "children," insert "actually performed in any mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment."

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to discuss this proposed amendment for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to discuss the amendment for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. Proof of the presence within 60 days prior to the shipment of such product therefrom (first) in a mine or quarry of a child under the age of 16 years, or (second) in a mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment (a) of a child under the age of 14 years, or (b) of a child between the ages of 14 years and 16 years for more than eight hours in any one day or more than six days in any one week, or after the hour of 7 o'clock p. m., or before the hour of 7 o'clock a. m. shall be prima facie evidence that such product has been produced in whole or in part by the labor of such a child.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

In line 5, page 2, strike out the word "presence" and insert the word "employment."

Mr. RAGSDALE. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. Has section 1 been adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been passed——

Mr. RAGSDALE. The question was not put as to the adoption of it.

The CHAIRMAN. It is unnecessary to vote on the section. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "employment," insert "in any mechanical capacity contributory to the production of any goods herein excluded from interstate commerce."

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the rule of evidence prescribed in this bill, if gentlemen will reflect a moment, is an exceedingly harsh one. The mere employment in a factory of a child under the prescribed age, no matter in what the capacity, constitutes prima facie evidence of the guilt of the offense described in this bill. A child under the age of 14 in a factory who conveys a message from one department to another at any time within 60 days prior to the shipment of goods would constitute prima facie evidence of guilt and subject the owner of the factory to arrest and prosecution, in a distant court, it may be, and to all the penalties and costs that would accrue from such prosecution.

The amendment is offered to define the kind of employment which shall be considered prima facie evidence of guilt. It ought not to be that the mere presence and employment of a child at a factory in noncommercial work should be held prima facie evidence of guilt. No such rule of evidence has ever been enacted heretofore that I know of.

Not only that, but there are goods made and manufactured in factories within the prescribed age limit for home consumption. That would be no crime under the provisions of this bill. A child employed in the manufacturing of goods which are to be sold at home is not unlawfully employed under your proposed law. But the employment of that child in a lawful occupation if the factory happened to be making goods for interstate commerce at the same time would, under the law you propose, be prima facie evidence of the guilt of the offense you pronounce in this bill. It ought not to be that the employment of a child as a messenger, or in any other capacity not mechanical, or contributory to the production of the goods for interstate shipment, should be held prima facie evidence of the guilt in this law. I hope that the members of the committee and of this House will appreciate the distinction I am trying to make in undertaking to fix a rule of evidence here which would not make a perfectly lawful act prima facie evidence of crime. I think, gentlemen, this amendment is entitled to serious consideration, and that this rule as now stated is harsh and unusual.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment so assiduously presented by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WATSON] would introduce confusion into the application of this rule. I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 2 of the bill.

[Mr. ALMON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago I introduced six or seven amendments which are constitutional, if this bill is constitutional. Of course I regard all of the amendments offered clearly unconstitutional, and the bill also, but I wanted to show the House what in my opinion would some day rise up to plague this House. Some of those amendments, if not all of them, in the same shape as I introduced them will come back to the floor of this House seriously, because if we have power to pass this bill we have power to pass each one of the amendments which I offered.

The amendment I offered in order to shut out foreign child labor made goods, if we are going to deny American child labor made goods interstate transportation, received 57 votes to 101 votes on a teller vote, and I desire to call attention of the House to the fact that the distinguished leader of the Republicans, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] did not think it wise to protect America from foreign child-made goods, and neither did the distinguished Member from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. Both of those distinguished gentlemen voted against my amendment. I desire that fact to be on record because we have heard so much talk about protecting America and American children against the manufactures of foreign children.

I would like to see this whole section 2 stricken out, because it is going to be the source of a multitude of spies and informers. I warn you gentlemen from other States, who are going to vote for this bill, not to rest in false security from the provisions of this bill. All of your manufacturers must comply with it, and place thousands of stamps upon all their articles of manufacture. It controls every and all child-labor laws, and your present State laws will be set aside, and this Federal law will operate on your internal manufacture and be enforced in the Federal courts by United States officials. I deny that a child 13 years old in North Carolina works 11 hours a day. They work from 4 to 4½ hours a day; the rest of the time they play on the lawn outside the mill. They handle little spools, 11 ounces in weight, which is much easier labor than they had been doing before they came to the factory. They get from 75 cents to $1.25 per day for such labor which enables the mother to buy good furniture, live in good rooms, such as many of them never had until they came to these "awful blood-thirsty, life-destroying" places, which agitators call southern cotton mills.

I want to resent the charge that any child ever works in my State as much as 11 hours a day. The doffer boys are only employed from 12 to 16, and their work can hardly be called work. They are employed for 10 hours, but only work constantly about half that time, during which they have to pick the spools off the spinning machines and put them in a light box and roll them away, and then they go out and play until they are called to come in again for similar work, and that makes a day's labor. That is the "horrible" condition you want to remedy down in North Carolina. Why not clean up Chicago, where my friend, Mr. MANN, lives? I saw an article from Springfield, under date of January 22, which says:

POVERTY VICE SOURCE—ILLINOIS INVESTIGATORS TELL OF CAUSES OF IMMORALITY—DANGER IN HOMES OF THE POOR—WAGES OF LESS THAN $8 A WEEK INADEQUATE, STATE COMMISSION REPORTS—CONDITIONS OF DOMESTIC EMPLOYMENT ARE ARRAIGNED.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., January 22.

Poverty is the principal cause of immorality; a minimum wage for girls and women should be $8 a week; and unregulated conditions of domestic employment render the home, in many cases, a breeding place of commercialized vice, according to the Illinois Senate white-slave investigation committee's report made public this week.

Thousands of girls, it says, are driven into prostitution "because of the sheer inability to keep body and soul together on the low wages they receive."

EMPLOYMENT SYSTEM CONDEMNED.

The system of domestic employment in America is condemned in positive terms. "Unregulated conditions of domestic employment, uncertain hours, absence of definite social status, and lack of creative opportunities render the home in many cases for the woman servants a breeding place of immorality," says the report.

Investigation disclosed that more women of the underworld fell into dishonor from domestic employment than from any other work. Of 181 girls sent to the State training school at Geneva, Ill., who had worked for a wage previous to commitment the committee found that 115, or 63.55 per cent, had been engaged in domestic service.

Now, if the Federal Government is going into the general business of correcting the morals and protecting the health of all the people, why do you aim at the little, cleanly factory? Why not make it apply to the big department stores and the poor girl who stands 8 to 10 hours on her feet? Why not make employers pay $8 a week, and thus protect her from shame? Why not regulate her hours of labor in Chicago by Federal power? You can do it with the same ease as you undertake to regulate labor in cotton factories. That would help to clean up Chicago, says this white-slave committee. It says that because of the small pay the poor girls get in that city it makes it a breeding place of commercialized vice. You can not charge any such thing as that to the southern cotton manufacturer, where children and young women are employed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Attorney General, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor shall constitute a board to make and publish from time to time uniform rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of this act.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 2, line 17, strike out the figure "2" and insert the figure "3."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] in addressing the House stated that conditions in Georgia were not the same as in South Carolina; that in Georgia the manufacturers were humane and the State threw the strong arm of the law around its children to protect them. I know that every Member learned with delight that the strong arm of the law in Georgia could protect some one. [Laughter and applause.] Likewise the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] lectures the people of the Carolinas. I had the honor of serving as a member of the committee that investigated the Colorado strike, and not only went down into the mines but also into the homes of the miners. I am acquainted with conditions in many cotton-mill villages in South Carolina, and in no village have I ever seen such deplorable conditions as existed in nearly every mining camp in Colorado. I have no doubt that in considering this matter he has in mind the conditions in his own State, but his very ignorance of conditions in cotton-mill villages in South Carolina illustrates the danger of Congress undertaking to regulate conditions of which they know nothing. If this legislation is enacted, then every Congressman must familiarize himself with labor conditions in every State else he can not intelligently regulate such conditions.

There is not on record a petition from a single operative for this legislation. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], without addressing the Chair, says, "Of course not"; and I have no doubt he is sincere in believing that it was not done, because they feared such action would meet the disapproval of the mill owners. But he is wrong. Because of my experience in Colorado I know that in that State, and I presume in others, where the employees are foreigners, the workers are ruled by their employers in political matters, and the employees fear to express their political opinions, unless they coincide with those of their employers. But in South Carolina conditions differ. There the employees never fail to express their views politically and take an active part in politics, and they generally are opposed to the faction to which the mill owner belongs. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. NICHOLLS] was not exaggerating this morning when he said that he was elected to Congress by the cotton-mill operatives and in spite of the bosses. I know the operatives and know but few of the bosses. The operatives, as I say, are generally on the opposite side politically from the bosses, and do not hesitate to express their opinion, and if they were in favor of this measure they would not have hesitated to so inform us instead of sending petitions to oppose it. I know that you wonder then why they are opposed to the bosses in politics. My own opinion is that inasmuch as they come from the farms they have brought with them the independence that is bred on the farm, and while they are willing to let the boss manage the ball team or engage in welfare work, they are quick to resent any effort to influence them in their political views.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words in favor of striking out this section, because I was a member years ago, in good old Republican days, of the Committee on the Judiciary of this House that reported unanimously against the constitutionality of this sort of a bill. I urge this House not to do evil that good may come.

Children are the hope of the State. They will be the State. The glorious work of making them worthy citizens, of giving them all a sufficient education, which includes the chance to learn how to earn their own living, their protection from oppression, their uplift, and, to that end, the regulation of every sort of business, this glorious work belongs to each State, to be carried out in every town, in every school, in every church, and in every family. And in proportion as that work is done in the State, in the town, in the church, in the school, and in the family community, that State will go on, and the State that neglects it will fall.

Under the influence of the splendid movement for the proper regulation of labor, especially of women and children, each State is now trying out such regulations as it thinks its condition and situation demand. They may make mistakes, but their experiments are testing what regulations are practical, effective, and beneficial, and will tend to make the children the most valuable, the most cherished, and the proudest possession of every family, so that they will rejoice in a full quiver. But that regulation is intrusted by the Constitution of the United States to the separate States, and rightly so, for the work can not be done so well by inflexible national rules, not only through the Union but through the islands of the sea.

We have all taken our oath to support that Constitution. I, at least, can not vote for this bill under that oath, even if I were convinced that this jurisdiction ought to be taken away from the States. And the bill itself confesses that we can not regulate labor, for it does not attempt such regulation; but, instead of that, it asks us to legalize a boycott—it is nothing else—of goods that are lawfully made in the State where they originate. A boycott may be fairly defined as a conspiracy or agreement to outlaw a man for doing what is perfectly lawful. Such a conspiracy is itself a crime. We, as a legislature, can lawfully put a ban on what is unlawfully produced. We are asked here to boycott what is lawfully produced, and even to imprison men who deal in what was lawfully made, and we are asked to enact this ban against our sister States—against sovereign States—and to bar their people and lawful products from interstate commerce.

This boycott is likewise to be supported by an army of inspectors and detectives and by the fine and imprisonment of people who deal in lawful goods.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I regret having to do so, but I will have to object. We are objecting to other gentlemen.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I never have made any delay on this bill.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman is one of the most courteous gentlemen on this floor, but in order to facilitate business I shall have to object.

Mr. MANN. Ask leave to extend.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I have the right to extend already.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] objects.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey, under leave to extend his remarks, submits the following:

The ban is not to touch foreign trade and the products of peonage or of child labor in foreign mills. Other nations are left to manage their own concerns, although, indeed, we could lawfully regulate foreign commerce in that regard. This boycott is directed especially against the rights that are guaranteed to our own States under our Constitution.

Did anyone ever pretend that the United States before the war could have barred cotton from interstate and foreign commerce because, though slavery was lawful, it had been raised by slave labor? That case would have had much more in its favor.

Is the law to make it a crime to trade in what is lawfully made? Is it to recognize and use the lawful power of putting men under a ban who have committed no crime? Must a country storekeeper have a certificate every time that he sells a handkerchief or a pair of socks?

If control by inspection and a passport system is to apply to all such transactions, it will be police government and not government by law.

We all sympathize with the objects sought by the promoters of this bill, but they will do the greatest harm to their cause if they take away the interest and responsibility in this matter of the neighborhood and the State which now has full power.

We shall do still more harm to the cause of liberty if we try to legalize an unconstitutional and oppressive exercise of police power in interstate commerce, even in order to secure a worthy end.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, while it is not often that all of us can enjoy the proud privilege of so distinguished a statesman as he who comes from so great a State as the gentleman from Georgia, yet there are some of us who come from States that may claim a little merit. We feel, at least, that in those emergencies that arise in which the chief executive of our respective States extend the right of executive clemency under the constitution of the State, that while we may fail to rise to broad and patriotic duties on other questions, we will at least rise to as high a point as that to which the distinguished citizens of Georgia arose, and try to defend our chief executive from the attacks of other patriotic, broad-minded patriots in our States when they try to strike down the chief executive while he is trying to discharge the duties devolving upon him under the constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment——

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I move now, sir, that the committee do rise.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] withdraw his motion?

Mr. LEWIS. No; I can not, I regret to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 8234, known as the child-labor bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit the following privileged motion.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from South Carolina rise?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. To make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and nineteen gentlemen are present—a quorum. The Clerk will report the privileged resolution offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from South Carolina rise?

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. To move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that the House adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina demands a division. Those in favor of the motion to adjourn will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Twenty-nine gentleman have risen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-nine have risen in the negative. On this vote the ayes are 29 and the noes are 169.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum, according to that count.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the point of order is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks a Member has the right to demand a quorum and have a count.

Mr. HOWARD. The Speaker has just counted.

The SPEAKER. Yes; the Chair has just counted; but you do not know how many have gone out since. The Chair will count again. [After counting.] Two hundred and twelve Members are present.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move a call of the House.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. I make the point of order that the House was dividing, and that under the rules of the House when the House is dividing there is no call of the House.

Mr. MANN. The House was not dividing.

Mr. CRISP. Yes; the House was dividing.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is correct.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is correct. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on agreeing to the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 48, nays 317, not voting 69, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The House refuses to adjourn. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion which is now at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it first.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 107.

That it shall be in order to continue the consideration of H. R. 8234 on call of the Committee on Labor on Calendar Wednesday until said bill shall be fully disposed of before proceeding with the call to any other committee.

Mr. KEATING. I move the previous question on the adoption of that resolution.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Mississippi rise?

Mr. HARRISON. To make a point of order on that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear it.

Mr. HARRISON. The point of order is that last Tuesday the rule concerning Calendar Wednesday was amended and changed by the House.

Mr. MANN. A week ago Tuesday.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. The rule that was adopted at that time reads as follows:

Provided, That not more than two hours of general debate shall be permitted on any measure called up on Calendar Wednesday, and all debate must be confined to the subject matter of the bill, the time to be equally divided between those for and against the bill: Provided further, That whenever any committee shall have occupied two Wednesdays it shall not be in order, unless the House by a two-thirds vote shall otherwise determine—

And so forth. The point I make is that the motion comes prematurely; that it is not in order to make a motion to continue the two Wednesdays that this rule would allow for the consideration of the bill until the time allotted for the two Wednesdays has been exhausted. Now you are placed in this attitude at this time: The time is not yet exhausted. This committee have another Wednesday or a part of another Wednesday in which to consider this bill, but here at this time, prematurely, they bring in a motion to continue indefinitely, as I understood the amendment, the consideration of this bill, giving the Committee on Labor a preference over other committees, and I submit that it is violative of the rule that was adopted by the House a week ago Tuesday and that the motion is not now in order and will not be in order until all the time granted under the rule—that is, the two Wednesdays—has been exhausted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is in error as to the law and also in error as to the facts. Take the facts first. The Committee on Labor has occupied two Calendar Wednesdays in succession. We passed a bill last Wednesday, on the call of committees, from the Committee on Labor, and commenced and had up for consideration another bill from this committee. By the unanimous consent of the House they have already been granted three hours on next Wednesday, but that is not under the rule. That was by unanimous consent of the House. The rule says that whenever any committee shall have occupied two Calendar Wednesdays, it shall not be in order unless the House, by a two-thirds vote, and so forth. They have occupied two Calendar Wednesdays. The committee has risen to-day and reported to the House. They have occupied the Calendar Wednesday to-day, and they occupied Calendar Wednesday a week ago. The two Calendar Wednesdays under the rule have been occupied, and the mere fact that the House, by unanimous consent, has given them three hours next Wednesday, not under the rule but under unanimous consent, does not change the language of the rule.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman does not pretend that the Committee on Labor has not two or three hours next Calendar Wednesday under the rules of the House?

Mr. MANN. They have three hours next Wednesday, by unanimous consent, but not under any rule.

Mr. HARRISON. If I understand the situation, last Wednesday, it was about 2 or 3 o'clock in the day that rather than proceed there was a unanimous-consent agreement entered into that some other committee of the House might take up their work and utilize the balance of the day.

Mr. MANN. I understand so; that is substantially the case, by unanimous agreement, but if they had only occupied 15 minutes of last Calendar Wednesday, under the rule that would be considered as having occupied a day.

But, Mr. Speaker, as long as this matter is up, it seems to me that there ought to be a broader ruling than that. Here is the case now before the House. Rules are made for the convenience of the House in order to carry on the business of the House. The House may want to know before it begins the consideration of a bill whether it will have one or two days, whether, in taking up the consideration of a bill, owing to the importance of the bill, it will proceed in advance to take three or four days or a longer time. Here is the identical case now. The question now for the House is whether it will authorize the consideration of this bill on next Calendar Wednesday and until it shall be completed, or whether it prefers, if that is not done, to finish it to-day, as it has a right to do. It is a matter for the convenience of the House, and it meets the convenience of the House to give the right to make the motion in advance of the consideration or at any time during the consideration of a bill, so that Members may guard themselves in the actual consideration of the bill. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. All the rules of the House are intended to expedite business and not retard it, and all the rulings by the Chair ought to be in harmony with that idea. Under certain circumstances the House makes a unanimous-consent agreement, but circumstances may change in 24 hours so that it wants to do something else. It would be tying our hands absolutely to say that you could not change a unanimous-consent agreement. It takes a two-thirds vote to make this extension. It could have been made just as well when the bill was first called up as it can be made now, or it could be made at any particular time the House saw fit. What has happened is that the Members of the House have evidently concluded in their own minds that they can not finish the bill to-day, and they wish it to be in order next Wednesday. Therefore a motion is made to settle the question now. The Chair thinks it is not premature, and that it might have been made on last Wednesday. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Colorado for the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the resolution of the gentleman from Colorado.

The question was taken, and two-thirds having voted therefor, the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. LITTLEPAGE was granted leave of absence for five days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. IGOE was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of R. W. Pavey, Sixty-third Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon by the Committee on War Claims.

DIRECTORY OF THE ORDER OF RAILWAY CONDUCTORS.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing a letter from the vice president of the Order of Railway Conductors of America.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

Hon. PERL D. DECKER, Member of Congress,

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The information has come to me that certain persons have carried on quite extensively among Members of Congress and officials in the departments what seems to have been a rather lucrative business, soliciting for a directory and roster claimed to be published by the Order of Railway Conductors.

I desire to state that these persons do not represent in any way the Order of Railway Conductors, and that no one has authority to sign for this organization except the president and the grand secretary. I beg to suggest also that if an attempt is made by anyone to solicit funds from you in the name of the Order of Railway Conductors for any purpose that you inform me, as we desire to prevent the perpetration of frauds of the character indicated.

Yours, respectfully,

W. M. CLARK,
Vice President, National Legislative Representative,

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 27, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come reverently before Thee that we may give prayerful attention to the problems that confront us in our national life. We know that beyond the measure of our minds there are great issues that do not yield their answer to the intellect alone, but lie back in the region of divine revelation. We come to seek Thy grace that we may address ourselves to the tasks that pertain to the welfare of this Nation in the spirit of the Christ, with a spirit of devotion and self-sacrifice and of piety and of brotherly love. Guide us in the discharge of these sacred duties this day. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PROPOSED EMBARGO ON MUNITIONS OF WAR.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I present a petition, signed by 1,000,000 citizens of the United States, against the exportation from this country of munitions of war. The petition, now separated into a thousand parts, is in front of the Secretary's desk; and while the subject matter of the petition is not unusual, being a petition to Congress to place an embargo on the shipment of ammunition and war utensils, yet the size of the petition is something unusual, and I should like to take two or three moments, and two or three other Senators will take two or three moments, if there is no objection. Of course we realize that objection could be made, but we very earnestly hope it will not.

I ask that the heading of the petition may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The heading to the petition is as follows:

ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN WOMEN FOR STRICT NEUTRALITY, Baltimore, Md.

To the President and the Congress of the United States:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, men and women, unite in earnest protest, for humanitarian reasons, against the exportation from this country of "the things which kill" for the use of nations engaged in the present conflict. While this sale of arms may be legal, it is morally wrong, and an embargo on arms is certainly legal and morally right. We base our protest on international law and precedent, as follows: Woolsey International Law: "If the neutral, instead of wheat, should send powder or balls, cannon or rifles, this would be a direct encouragement of the war, and so a departure from the neutral position."

President Taft in 1912 issued a proclamation forbidding the export of arms and munitions to Mexico.

In 1913 President Wilson, continuing the policy of President Taft, said that an embargo on arms "follows the best practice of nations in the matter of neutrality."

On April 23, 1898, after the Spanish-American War had begun, the British Government placed an embargo on munitions of war. The British Government also has a law on its statute books conferring discretionary power on the King of England to forbid the export of arms and ammunition.

Germany did not permit her citizens to sell arms or munitions of war to Spain during our war with that nation.

Besides all this we have President Wilson's own declaration of neutrality: "We must be neutral in fact as well as in name, and we must put a curb on every transaction which might give a preference to one party in the struggle over another."

Your signature will help stop this war.

Mr. KENYON. This petition, Mr. President, is presented by a band of women who are denominated "Organization of American Women for Strict Neutrality." The petition is signed by over a million people, reaching into every State in this Union, and if joined together in its various parts it would reach some 15½ miles.

There is no desire on the part of these women to irritate in any way the present conditions; to do any unpatriotic act or to in any way do anything sensational. The signers of this petition from every State in the Union are not pro-British or pro-German; they are pro-American, pro-humanity, and pro-Christianity; they are actuated only by the highest humanitarian motives.

The tremendous manufacture and shipment of things to kill people with is, however, prompted by no patriotic motive. It is not done merely because international law may permit it. It is a cold-blooded, money-making proposition for gain, profit, dividends. "Thou shalt not kill" is recognized as good morals as well as divine law, to which may well be added, "Thou shalt not assist others to kill."

Let us not deceive ourselves or hug to our bosom any delusion as to the prosperity coming to us from profits arising from helping to slaughter men, to widow women, and to orphan children. The jingle of the bloody dollar can not drown the sound of the groans and cries of misery arising from the battle fields of Europe. International law may permit it; moral law condemns it.

On October 4, 1914, the religious people of the United States, at the suggestion of the President, assembled and prayed for peace. Mr. President, to pray for peace on Sunday and to permit the balance of the week to be spent manufacturing and selling instrumentalities to prevent peace is rank hypocrisy.

The signers of this petition believe it is bad to continue these shipments, bad because it is inhuman, and this petition represents their dignified, solemn protest against the practice. Likewise it represents the toil, labor, heart throbs, and hopes of a noble band of women, who abhor war and pray that it may soon cease.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, at a later period I expect to speak at some length upon this subject. I merely wish to say at this time that I believe sooner or later the awakened conscience of our Christian Nation will sweep aside the sophistries that have been invoked to support the inconsistent and incongruous spectable of loading one ship with food and clothing for widows and orphans and loading another ship with the instrumentalities with which to make more widows and orphans.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] has presented this enormous petition, signed by over a million people of the United States, praying for prohibition on the exportation of arms and ammunition.

Mr. President, before I sit down I shall move that this great petition, instead of being referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which were referred the bills to prohibit the exportation of arms and ammunition introduced by the Senator from California and myself, shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

I shall do this for two reasons: First, I think the original reference was probably a mistake, for the reason that this is not a foreign affair. This is purely a domestic question.

I also do it, Mr. President, because yesterday and to-day I have received several telegrams which indicate a condition throughout the West which should attract the attention of the Committee on Commerce. I desire to read some of those telegrams for the enlightenment of the Senate. The first one is from Byron, Nebr., and is addressed to me, and reads as follows:

BYRON, NEBR., January 25, 1916.

Hon. GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK,
Washington, D. C.:

We are tied up here; can not move any grain car. Shortage situation desperate. Please work for an immediate embargo on shipments of war munitions, to remain in force until the accumulated grain is released.

BYRON FARMERS' ELEVATOR CO.,
By J. G. JAMES, Manager.

Another one is from Pleasanton, Nebr., also addressed to me, and reads as follows:

PLEASANTON, NEBR., January 25, 1916.

Hon. G. M. HITCHCOCK,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Please work in Congress for an immediate embargo on shipment of war munitions, embargo to remain in force until the accumulated grain is unloaded and released at the seaports. Shortage of grain cars in this territory is becoming alarming and getting worse. The condition of corn demands immediate movement.

D. PHILLIPS.

Another is from Potter, Nebr., and reads as follows:

POTTER, NEBR., January 25, 1916.

Senator HITCHCOCK,
Washington, D. C.:

Car shortage is very serious—tied up. Can you work in Congress for an immediate embargo on munitions of war, embargo to remain in force until accumulated grain is released? Situation desperate with us.

FARMERS' GRAIN & MILLING CO.

Another is from Farwell, Nebr., and reads as follows:

FARWELL, NEBR., January 26, 1916.

Senator HITCHCOCK,
Washington, D. C.:

Can not get grain cars here to move our wheat and soft corn because of the preference given to munitions of war in eastern ports. Situation getting worse daily. Kindly take up with Congress for embargo on munitions of war until we can get accumulated grain released.

FARMERS' COOPERATIVE GRAIN & SUPPLY CO., Per JOHN HOFSETH, Manager.

Mr. President, I call these to the attention of the Senate, and particularly to the attention of the Committee on Commerce, because they present a new issue. This manufacture of deadly arms and ammunition has become of such absorbing and controlling interest in the East as to require new factories for the manufacture of these munitions and the enlargement of the old factories upon such scale that the industry is becoming the chief business in the eastern part of the United States to-day; and the arms and ammunition being thus manufactured for their deadly work in Europe absorb the cargo space of our ocean-going vessels that ought to be given to the legitimate business of the United States.

If the appeals to the sentiment of the country, to the moral sense of the country, to the religious sense of the country, are not sufficient in this body to arouse a responding action, if they are not sufficient in this body to command the attention of Senators, perhaps they will listen to the cry that is coming up from the West, where legitimate business is being paralyzed by the absorption of the ocean-carrying vessels of the country in this damnable trade in arms and ammunition.

Shall this country be converted into a great arsenal and shall our legitimate business be paralyzed in the West in order that millionaires may be made in the East, that munition stock may be doubled and trebled and quadrupled in value by men who are bringing upon this country a heritage of hate abroad, by men who are bringing on this country a sense of contempt abroad even by the nations that are benefited by this trade? It is now fashionable in those nations to proclaim that the Yankees, as long as they are making money out of this damnable commerce, will submit to any interference with their neutral rights.

Mr. President, I say this is not a matter of foreign affairs for the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is a matter of domestic concern, not only because of the legitimate interests which are imperiled but it is a matter of domestic concern because it is no business of any country in Europe, of any belligerent in Europe, whether we place an embargo upon the exportation of arms and ammunition or whether we do not. We can be neutral and permit this outrageous trade under international law, there is no doubt of that, but we can also be neutral and prohibit it.

No country has a right to demand that we prohibit it. No country has that right, neither has any country the right to deny to us the privilege of prohibiting it. It is purely a domestic question, and it is an American question, Mr. President, which involves not only our legitimate business interests, which involves not only our moral conscience and our religious sense, but it is a domestic question because it involves the integrity and solidarity of our population. Shall we permit this damnable trade to go on and breed hate at home among the great foreign-born population that is in our midst? Shall we permit this trade to go on and to continue to stimulate this feeling of hate not only abroad but at home among the millions of citizens who are a part of us? Whether those citizens are English born or Swedish born or Danish born or Irish born or German born or Bohemian born or Polish born, it is not within the limits of human nature for them to behold the great resources of our country dedicated to the manufacture of deadly weapons to be sent abroad to kill their relatives in the Old World without being filled with indignation and hate. When they see that these great banking and industrial resources of America are used for that purpose, it is natural for them to resent it, and thus breed in this country a dangerous race hatred. If it continues long, it will tend to produce in our population a disintegration into the races which ought to be amalgamated into the great new American race.

So, Mr. President, I say that this is a domestic or American question, one involving our welfare, involving the solidarity of our people, and I hope it will be considered without regard to its effect on Europe.

I am a neutral, Mr. President. I do not want to see either side in this war crush the other side. I am against having either of them victorious. I am for America.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator whether perhaps the situation as to the movement of grain might not be entirely relieved if favorable action were taken on this petition at present, the circumstances being that two-thirds at least of our shipping is controlled to-day by foreign nations. We have less than 2,000,000 tons under the American flag. The rest of the tonnage necessary to move the commerce between the United States and foreign countries is entirely controlled by those countries. So it is a question of very serious moment in connection with the movement of corn and other grain as to whether or not we are ever going to provide for an American merchant marine which can move our commerce to foreign ports.

Mr. STONE and Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to enter into this discussion. I do not think it a proper time for that. I was advised by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] that he wished to address the Senate for two or three minutes in presenting these petitions, and that one or two other Senators would like to occupy about the same length of time; but the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has made an extended speech on the general subject of embargo, and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] followed with a speech relating to the shipping bill. Heaven only knows where or to what length this discussion will run if it continues without interruption.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. STONE. I hope the discussion will not be further persisted in, and I make the point of order that debate is not in order on a mere question of referring a petition. I ask whether the Chair thinks such a question is debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion of the Senator from Nebraska is in order and is debatable.

Mr. STONE. Then in that view the debate can proceed on that motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has been examining the rules, and does not find that this is one of the questions that are to be settled without debate, it being a question for the Senate to determine whether these petitions should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which the Chair would have felt compelled to send them if there had been no question raised; but it is the right of the Senator from Nebraska to move to send them to any other committee, and that question is debatable.

Mr. STONE. Undoubtedly the Chair would have referred the petitions to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as the bills to which they relate have already been referred to that committee. It would be an odd proceeding to send a bill to one committee to-day and on to-morrow send petitions relating to the bill to a different committee. Either the whole matter should remain with the Committee on Foreign Relations or the Committee on Foreign Relations should be discharged from the consideration of the subject and the whole matter be referred to another committee.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri permit me to interrupt him for a minute?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to section 5 of Rule VII.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. I understand this is simply a question as to the reference of a petition, and I understand that under section 5 of Rule VII all petitions shall be presented and referred without debate. This is not a motion to refer a bill. The rule directs how petitions shall be received and referred; it seems to me it states clearly that petitions shall be received and referred without debate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SWANSON. I will read what the rule says, if the Chair desires me to do so. It provides:

5. Every petition or memorial shall be signed by the petitioner or memorialist and have indorsed thereon a brief statement of its contents, and shall be presented and referred without debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Virginia will read section 4 of Rule VII he will observe this language:

4. Every petition or memorial shall be referred, without putting the question, unless objection to such reference is made; in which case all motions for the reception or reference of such petition, memorial, or other paper shall be put in the order in which the same shall be made, and shall not be open to amendment, except to add instructions.

The rules sometimes seemingly conflict.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Chair will permit me to make a suggestion, that means that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] can not move to amend the motion for reference by inserting the Committee on Foreign Relations for the Committee on Commerce, but the question of debate is settled definitely by section 5, which says such papers shall be "referred without debate."

I do not see any conflict, if the Chair will permit me, between the two sections. The rule simply says that the motions shall be put in the order in which they are made. The Senator from Nebraska first made the motion, and that takes precedence of any motion for reference to another committee, and can not be amended by motion to refer to another committee; but section 5 distinctly states that petitions shall be presented and referred without debate. It seems that section 4 simply provides the order in which those different motions for reference must be made, voted on, and determined.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is quite likely to be wrong, but the Chair is clearly of the opinion that this is what all the rules of the Senate mean when construed together, that it is not proper to discuss a petition or memorial presented to the Senate of the United States; and the Chair assumes that that is the reason why the Senator from Iowa spoke to the Senator from Missouri about the matter, in order that there should be no objection to the discussion on the memorials or petitions which have been presented. The Chair has no doubt at all that under the ordinary procedure of the Senate of the United States petitions and memorials are not to be discussed, but are to be referred without debate; when, however, any Senator takes issue with the Chair, or, without taking issue with the Chair, desires a petition or memorial to be referred to a certain committee, then the Chair believes that the Senator has a right to move to refer it to a certain committee, and that that question is debatable—not the merits of the petition but the question as to where the petition shall go—but, of course, from that decision of the Chair the Senator has the privilege of appeal.

Mr. STONE. I should like the Chair to submit that question to the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not hear the last part of the rule which the Chair read. Was it to the effect that the motion to refer to a committee was not amendable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I could not hear the rule as read by the Chair, but that was the impression I got as the Chair read the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This rule provides:

Every petition or memorial shall be referred, without putting the question—

And without debate, as the Chair understands, under section 5 of the rule—unless objection to such reference is made, in which case all motions for the reception or reference of such petition, memorial, or other paper shall be put in the order in which the same shall be made, and shall not be open to amendment, except to add instructions.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now, then, my parliamentary inquiry is, Is not the motion of the Senator from Nebraska to send these petitions to the Committee on Commerce amendable by moving to send them to some other committee, and would not the amendment be debatable, as well as the original motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment.

Mr. STONE. I should like to say while the Chair——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In other words, what is in my mind is this: If a Senator introduces a petition and moves its reference to a particular committee, if it is not within the power of the Senate to amend the motion by substituting some other committee, then the only method of procedure open to the Senate is to vote that motion down if they disagree to the reference and then move to send it to another committee. I think the custom is—I have repeatedly seen it done—that a Senator moves to substitute another committee than the one suggested by the Senator who makes the motion.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I make an appeal to the Senator from Missouri? We would have been through with this matter by this time if it had not been for this interruption. Will not the Senator wait and let the few speeches that are to be made be concluded? They will all be very brief, and will not take, I think, more than 15 or 20 minutes.

Mr. STONE. That was the assurance the Senator gave me in the first instance.

Mr. KENYON. And that assurance was carried out.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] was not very brief, and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] did not discuss this subject at all. Can the Senator assure me that there is no Senator here present who will occupy more than one or two minutes and that the discussion will be confined to this petition? Of course, the Senator can not do that.

Mr. KENYON. That would be a preposterous thing to assume about the Senate.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. If the Senator from Missouri will yield to me for a moment, I will say that I do not desire to take the time or to interfere with the business of the Senate; but I feel that this is a subject of the greatest importance to the American people, and I should like to express my feelings in a very few words, with the permission of the Senate.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the Senator knows I would yield to any request of his as quickly as to that of anyone, but I desire to have this matter ended now, if it can be ended. I object to any implied, much less express, unanimous consent. No express unanimous consent was asked and none given.

Mr. President, speaking to the point of order, if the ruling of the Chair is correct, it would leave the Senate in a somewhat helpless condition. Any Senator wishing to delay the proceedings of the Senate could offer a petition and a motion then be made to refer it; and if the matter is then open to debate, every Senator here would have the right to debate it.

Mr. OVERMAN. And take up the morning hour.

Mr. STONE. Not only one morning hour, but the morning hours for a week or a month in debating the motion to refer. If that is the rule, it ought not to be; and, with a view to testing the sense of the Senate, I think I will appeal from the ruling of the Chair, unless the Chair will voluntarily submit the question to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think, under the ruling of the Chair, it is a debatable motion, and an appeal from the decision of the Chair on a debatable proposition is itself subject to debate. I would not care to occupy much of the time of the Senate; but I think the Chair is right.

Of course, many of our rules may be condemned by pointing out the fact that they are susceptible of abuse when any considerable group of Senators see proper to practice that form of abuse known as unlimited debate. That particular question has been repeatedly considered by the Senate, and after a hundred years of resistance the other side of it has appeared to be the stronger.

I think the whole purpose of our proceedings here is to afford a clear opportunity to put the Senate in possession of the reasons why a certain thing should be done or the reasons why it should not be done. There may be exceptional reasons in this case. Ordinarily matters of this kind can be disposed of by the Chair. In nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand they are disposed of by the Chair and by the clerks at the desk. It occasionally comes about that there is a necessity for saying something about a particular proposition; but I think the common sense and fairness of the Senate can be relied upon to put a necessary limitation on the occasion. I therefore think that the ruling announced by the Chair is founded on the reason of the case and harmonizes perfectly with the general scope of proceedings here.

Now, take this particular case. Ordinarily it would be a matter of indifference as to what particular committee a number of petitions on any subject should go. It is almost the constant practice here to pay no particular attention to petitions, but this particular case takes a significance at this time that it would not take at another time. I believe that there should have been an embargo laid upon the export of arms. I believe this country, in its greatness, should have set the world the example of refusing to be a party, directly or indirectly, for commercial or any other reasons, to the slaughter of human beings that is going on in the Old World. I believe that the enlightened conscience of the age would have justified it, and that such action would have added one more reason why this should be regarded as the greatest Government that ever was instituted among men. I do not believe that we did our duty when we fell in behind the ancient precedents, made at a time when slaughter was the rule; that we did not concrete into our action the enlightened spirit of the Christian humanity that exists to-day, and which we preach theoretically but which we fail to enforce practically.

Many insist that to do so now would be a breach of neutrality; the question loses its character of one where the proposition is to lay an embargo or not, and the question of neutrality is injected into it. Nations have been forced to rely upon it; they say they have; and they have built their foreign policies and other relations to us on the theory of our past practice, and now to undertake to stop it as a mere commercial question at home would not meet the question in its ultimate boundaries.

I think the petition should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It has now become a vital question of international policy. It may be too late to take definite action such as we ought to take—if it is ever too late to do right—and it may not be; but in the confidence of that committee, in my opinion, would be the best place to consider it in its present aspect, and I think those of us who feel that way about it ought to have an opportunity to say that.

The Committee on Commerce is a strictly commercial committee. It deals with the commercial aspect of the shipping question, most particularly with reference to that part of the shipping function that takes place on the waters. There is another committee of the Senate that deals with it in the aspect which relates to the railroads, but now time and circumstances, past practices, contentions upon the one hand, and denials upon the other, have made another question out of it. It is a matter, in my opinion, peculiarly fit for decision by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I feel very much in sympathy with the suggestions advanced by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I feel that this is a peculiar and remarkable situation; and for myself I want to take this opportunity to express my feelings a little on this subject, and I feel very deeply about it.

My father came from France; my good mother came from Germany; so you may wonder what my sympathies may be in this hellish war and controversy in Europe. I will say that my heart bleeds for Europe and its people. Do you ask me my sympathies? My sympathies are with humanity, wherever they may be found and wherever they may go.

I care not whom this matter of embargo may benefit. That is a question as foreign to me as the pole. The question with me is as to the justice, the humanitarian side, and the right of the proposition. I will not aid my brother in the slaughter of his fellow man. The business side of the proposition that has been advanced here has no appeal to me. Money is valuable, but, great God, better and above all that is the love for humanity!

I feel, Mr. President, that a greater danger will come to this blessed land from the money changers in our land than from any force of arms that can be arrayed against it. I am thankful, indeed, that the petition has been brought in here, and I trust that it may be potent with the governing power of this country toward staying the shipment of arms to further bring blood and sorrow to the soil of Europe.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not always agree with the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]; but he has spoken eminently to my satisfaction this morning.

It might be proper for me to recall that in the Sixty-third Congress, during the third session thereof, the distinguished Senator who contributes such credit to this Chamber and such usefulness to his own State, Mr. HITCHCOCK, introduced to an appropriation bill an amendment laying an embargo upon the shipment of arms to the belligerents of Europe.

I took pleasure in voting for his amendment; and I embrace this opportunity to express my belief that the 1,000,000 signatures of persons who have seen fit to exercise their constitutional prerogative and send their petition here could be multiplied fifty or sixty times, because of the feeling throughout the Nation that we are not guiltless before the moral law when for mere "profits" we send arms to the belligerents that they may grind up more human flesh to be buried nameless in a trench. We can not simply stand off, point to the width of our phylacteries, and say we are wholly guiltless while we take blood-money profits from the warring powers.

Mr. President, I am not so simple as to pretend that I believe it is contrary to international law to send arms and munitions to the warring powers. Of course, it is according to international law to ship arms to warring nations. It is also according to the "profits." We have heard of "the law and the prophets." It is the "profits," however, rather than "law" that move these munition makers to reap and glean in such a doubtful field.

The Senator spoke of "Yankees." What is the sentiment of the Yankees on this subject? When guns made by foreign powers were aimed at their breasts, their statesmen, warriors, poets, orators, writers, and lecturers objected to the shipment of arms to their antagonists; and that great writer in a little couplet—I believe it will be found in the Bigelow Papers—said:

You wonder why we're hot, John?
Your mark was on the guns—
On the guns that shot, John,
Our brothers and our sons.

So, Mr. President, if there be to-day one influence in our country more baleful than another it is that the continued shipment of arms and ammunition to the warring nations is causing the suggestion that the United States is a country seeking only profit and not seeking wholly to do justice to humanity.

When the eternal verities of the world are finally presented and the living thunders of eternal truth clear the atmosphere, it ought to be the destiny of our advanced, our American, civilization to take an exalted position in the tribunal which will compose these world-wide differences. What will be our position when the day of reckoning comes? When the immortal roll of the nations of the earth is called to make up a peace tribunal, what nation is there more able, more worthy than the United States to take its place and stand at the head of the supreme court of arbiters which will settle that unhappy conflict which is dislocating all the currents of the world? How compromising will be our position in that great tribunal if our hands be even indirectly stained with human blood. Will it not be inferred that we are biased or prejudiced when it is remembered that we encouraged the warring powers by the shipment to them of arms and ammunition? Our country should be the nation set upon a hill whose light should shine and encourage all. It should be the one nation above all ready to set an example to the others, and when peace finally comes our Nation should enter the great Sanhedrim of nations—the great Sanhedrim of the world—stainless and pure, able truthfully to look all the other nations in face and say, "We have not contributed in any way to the perpetuation or the prolongation of your gigantic strife." Let us enter that great court with clean hands. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] says, sotto voce, "shake not thy gory locks at me."

Let us hope, Mr. President, when the day of reckoning comes we can truthfully say to the other powers:

Thou canst not say I did it; never shake
Thy gory locks at me.

Hard feelings, resentments, and enmities which I fear will endure longer than the life of any person in this Chamber, including the pages who serve us here, are being created, and will smolder from this traffic in arms and munitions carried on at this time. These shipments of arms and ammunition, owing to the great profits which are arising from them, breed the war spirit in our country, and are causing many honest people to believe that we should turn our country into an armed military camp.

The baleful influence of this traffic of such doubtful propriety does not stop there, however. For more than 20 years the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has labored to secure the erection of a factory for the purpose of permitting the Government to manufacture its own armor plate, its own munitions, arms, and its own powder, in order that the extortionate profits taken by the manufacturers may be somewhat curtailed. But with all his eminence as a statesman, with his continual work of 20 years he has made little progress. And to-day I doubt very much if he will be able to bring in a bill providing for the construction of a Government-owned armor-plate factory and a factory for making our own arms and munitions.

What has caused this country for 20 years to be deprived of an armor-plate factory and a factory for the manufacture of its own munitions? Profits, not law; profits in order that certain men may reach out and gather in not only 50 per cent but 500 per cent.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I rise to address myself to the rule. Of course I always dislike to differ with the Chair.

The rules fix a morning hour. What is the morning hour for? The introduction of petitions; to allow the committees to make reports; to allow concurrent and joint resolutions to be introduced. And you see all through this rule, Rule VII, that debate is prohibited.

Now, a large part of the morning hour has been taken up with debate on this matter. I am making no objection to the merits of what has been done this morning; but as to the rule, it seems to me that if the Chair is right any Senator or a small number of Senators can absolutely take up the morning hour, and deprive us of introducing our petitions, our bills, and our reports of committees.

Reading along in this rule, it says:

Until the morning business shall have been concluded, and so announced from the Chair, or until the hour of 1 o'clock has arrived, no motion to proceed to the consideration of any bill, resolution, report of a committee, or other subject upon the calendar shall be entertained.

And so, Mr. President, in every section there is a limitation upon motions or a limitation upon debate; showing that the Senate intended, when it made this rule, that there should be an hour during which Senators could present the reports of committees and introduce their bills.

Therefore, while I hate to differ with the Chair, I think the Chair is wrong.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, with what has been said by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] I am in sympathy. Nevertheless, I believe that if this subject is to be discussed now it should be pointed out that heretofore the United States never has adopted the policy of manufacturing for itself a sufficient supply of munitions of war to provide it in case this Government should become engaged in conflict.

During all the wars in which we have been engaged the United States has been compelled to purchase abroad much of the munitions which we have used in war. While it is true that as a result of the increase in this trade we are now manufacturing in the United States greater quantities of munitions than ever before in the history of the country, it is also true that at this time we are not equipped with sufficient machinery and factories to supply the demands of the United States in case she should become involved in war.

I hope, sir, that the day will never dawn when this country will be called upon to enter into another serious conflict. I belong to that class of citizens who believe that the time is approaching when men will find some means of settling their disputes, however bitter they may be, without resorting to war; and yet I realize that force is still the most powerful factor in the arbitrament of the important questions that arise before the peoples of the world. The time has not yet come when we can expect to continue at peace without the possibility, at least, of becoming engaged in war.

I merely want to suggest to the Senate that in considering the matter of placing an embargo on arms and munitions of war we should bear in mind the necessities of the United States itself, and not too quickly commit this Government to a policy which would deny her the means of self-defense in case we should become involved in a war with a foreign power. For if we assert as a doctrine of humanity, or as a doctrine of international law, that a neutral nation can not sell arms to a belligerent, then we must expect to have that doctrine invoked and applied against us in case we should find ourselves compelled to combat an aggressive enemy. Of course embargoes for retaliatory purposes rest upon a different basis. I do not discuss that now, but merely suggest that the safety of the United States may be involved in the question under present conditions and while we have no provision for manufacturing adequate munitions to meet the requirements of this Government in case of war.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am in very hearty sympathy with the objects and purposes of the good women of the country who have brought this petition before the Senate.

From the very beginning I have been opposed to the exportation of arms and munitions of war. Early in the last session of Congress I introduced a bill to place an embargo upon the trade, not in the interest of any foreign nation but in the interest of our own country. I believe the trade to be immoral and demoralizing to the people of the United States. I believe that most of the complications that have grown up between this and foreign nations now at war have been the result of the trade in munitions of war. I believe that if it had not been for the fact that we were dealing in that nefarious trade the people upon the Lusitania would not have lost their lives.

We have, in effect, made our country a party to the war across the ocean. It is our ammunition, our shot and shell, that are taking the lives of the citizens and subjects of friendly nations in Europe. We can not justify ourselves in that position or in that trade by saying that it is allowed by the laws of neutrality. There is something higher that should control the people of the United States than the mere strict law of neutrality. The law of neutrality at most only permits the exportation of arms and places no obligation upon us to do so.

My convictions upon this subject were intensified when circumstances so came about that we could furnish arms only to one set of the belligerent nations as against the other. Then to my mind the trade ceased to be neutral; it ceased to be.

justified even by the permission of the laws of neutrality. But I have tried to put the question upon higher grounds than that. I insist that the trade is immoral; it is participating in the war across the ocean, and for that reason it ought to be stopped. Therefore, I am saying these few words in support of the petition that is now presented to the Senate.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I am now and at all times have been opposed to the exportation of munitions of war to the citizens of one country with which we are at peace to kill the citizens of another country with which we are at peace. I fear that sooner or later we, as a nation, will have to answer for it; that it will create deep-seated resentment and perhaps a hatred of us by the people of other nations—good people—who will find it hard to forgive us for the death of their brothers, their cousins, and their fathers and their sons who have been killed by missiles made in this country, propelled by powder made in this country. I have felt that no good—or, rather, nothing but harm—could come from it; that we had better do without the money which we make in that way. I would be willing to vote for an appropriation to ship to those who have suffered from the results of the war in Europe shiploads of baby shoes, of condensed and prepared milk upon which to feed the starving infants and clothing for the women who are suffering from want, and to convoy them with battleships, if necessary, to see that they reach their destination.

I believe that infinite harm will result in this country, in our own affairs, from the hatred that has been bred among our own people, which will last for generations. I have regretted, and I am sorry, that many people in business in this country have felt differently, and have felt that they were justified in entering in that kind of a trade. I am neutral as between the nations. If we could have kept entirely out of it, it would have been one of the greatest blessings not only for them but for us.

I am in sympathy with the petitioners, and I could not let the occasion pass without saying so.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate long upon the direct issue before the Senate, which is the ruling of the Vice President.

The Vice President has held that a motion to refer a petition is debatable. I think that rule would be very disastrous to the business of the morning hour. I think it would be ruinous to have that rule adopted as a rule of the Senate. It seems to me that it is so plainly against the clear, specific provisions of Rule VII that I want to call the attention of the Senate to Rule VII, section 5.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia permit me to call his attention to a ruling made by the Chair on the 28th of March, 1914, in connection with the subject he is now discussing? It will save the trouble of bringing the matter to the attention of the Senate at a later time.

Mr. SWANSON. I will.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. On page 95 of the Precedents this appears:

> The VICE PRESIDENT. In this connection the Chair desires to make a statement. The Chair was in error in ruling that the question of the reference of a bill to a committee is not debatable. The Chair was under the impression that the question was one of those questions which, under Rule XXII, are not debatable; but the Chair finds that the question is debatable. Therefore the ruling of the Chair heretofore made in reference to the matter will not stand as a precedent.

The ruling made by the Chair this morning is in exact accord with that ruling.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, there is this difference. There is no motion here of a resolution or bill for reference. No resolution is on the table; none has been introduced. The specific question is whether petitions when presented, not a bill or a resolution, are debatable.

Mr. KENYON. That is not the question at all. The question is on a motion to refer.

Mr. SWANSON. Here are petitions presented. There is no resolution, no bill. A motion is made to refer those petitions. That is the issue. The question is whether a motion to refer a petition is debatable.

I will read section 5 of Rule VII, and I should like to hear the Senator from Arkansas explain it away. This is not a motion to refer a resolution or a bill. Here is the rule of the Senate governing petitions:

> Every petition or memorial shall be signed by the petitioner or memorialist and have indorsed thereon a brief statement of its contents, and shall be presented and referred without debate.

Mr. KENYON. We are not debating the petition but the motion.

Mr. SWANSON. The rule says that a petition shall be referred without debate. You are attempting to reverse the rule that it shall be referred without debate.

Mr. KENYON. Of course, if there were no motion pending.

Mr. SWANSON. It is laid down in the compilation here—

> The presentation of petitions and memorials shall be determined without debate.

The Senator was correct in reference to a motion made to refer a resolution or a bill, but that is not the issue. The issue is when a petition is presented here in the morning hour, and a motion is made to refer it, whether we shall continuously debate it. Section 5 of Rule VII says that petitions shall be referred without debate. That is all we have asked in this case.

Before I conclude my remarks I wish to say a few words about the reference of the petition. Bills have gone to the Committee on Foreign Relations which appertain to the petition. Bills have heretofore been introduced covering this question, and they have been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The question involved more than all else is whether the shipment is an act of neutrality, whether it is good faith with all the belligerents in this great war, and the Committee on Foreign Relations is to determine that question. It is to determine the effect of it. It is to determine whether it will embroil us in war or not. The Committee on Foreign Relations is empowered to consider our intricate foreign relations, and that is the proper committee to dispose of this petition.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I understand the question to be submitted to the Senate is whether or not this question is open to debate. Am I correct about that?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that the motion of the Senator from Nebraska to refer the petitions to the Committee on Commerce is a debatable question. Upon that an appeal has been taken, and the pending question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I think the ruling of the Chair is correct. I do not think this question presents a mere matter of reference of a petition which under the rule is to be disposed of without debate. We have gotten beyond that. The Senator from Nebraska has moved that the petitions be referred to a particular committee, and that question, it seems to me, very clearly is open to debate. Passing that, however, and coming to the question of the disposition of the motion, it seems to me very clearly that the petitions ought not to go to the Committee on Commerce, but that they should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

To what subject are these petitions directed? To the subject of an embargo. They ask the Congress of the United States to pass a law placing an embargo upon the shipment of certain goods to foreign countries. The proposed legislation, therefore, to which the petitions are directed clearly would be a class of legislation which would go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The subject matter of an embargo comes under the general principles of international law. The Committee on Foreign Relations is constituted for the express purpose of dealing with such questions, and I am at a loss to understand upon what theory the proposed legislation itself should go to one committee and petitions requesting that that specific legislation shall be passed should go to an entirely different committee.

Obviously the petitions belong to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

But, independently of the rule and in support of the policy of the rule, it is peculiarly appropriate that these petitions should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, because in the last analysis they deal with an exceedingly delicate question of our foreign relations, namely, the question of our neutrality. If Europe was not at war, if peace prevailed throughout the world, we might pass an act prohibiting for the future the transportation of munitions of war from our country to any other country without affecting the question of neutrality at all. But that is not the situation. A condition of war prevails in Europe. It is idle for us to pretend that the act of Congress with reference to this question will not have a very profound effect upon the warring nations in Europe.

I undertake to say if we should pass a law here prohibiting the shipment of munitions abroad it would be a very great aid to and very greatly strengthen the hands of one of the contending parties in the war.

In that state of the case it is proper that we should consider the question as to whether we would not, by complying with these petitions, be committing an unneutral act; and, that being so, it is clearly a question the Committee on Foreign Relations should consider and determine.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I realize the importance of the subject of these petitions. I understand the serious interest which all of the people feel, and I do not desire that sympathy or impulsive sentiments should betray me into supporting a measure that mature judgment might find to be detrimental to our country. Yet, Mr. President, I can not see how the United States can in good conscience take any other position than the one proposed by the petitioners and so strongly advocated by the senior Senator from Nebraska. We have taken the position of neutrality; at least, we have attempted to take it. We have professed it from the beginning, and yet one of the belligerents to whom the great supply of arms is shipped has repeatedly changed and in some cases annulled the international law, since the war opened, as to our neutral rights. Those changes have been detrimental to the commerce of the United States, and our repeated polite and diction-perfect diplomatic protests have been ignored.

Therefore it seems to me that we could not be embarrassed, as suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], if at this time we take action which certainly we had a right to do at the beginning of the war and which has been postponed too long already.

I voted at the first and only opportunity I have had to accomplish that end. I do not believe the status of international relations has been so changed as to preclude us now from doing the thing which I think most disinterested Americans would have recognized as the right thing to have done at the beginning.

Mr. President, I think it is generally believed that the United States has not been impartially neutral in reference to the European war. I think we are regarded at home and abroad as one of the allies, and all through the shipment of arms and munitions of war to them, while permitting, with only weak protest, the violation of American rights by Great Britain in a manner greatly detrimental to both the United States and the central powers.

I express no favorites among the belligerents. I have none. I am absolutely neutral in this respect. Our country should have none. That it does have I have no doubt. That it can not be truly neutral so long as it permits the shipment of war supplies to one of the belligerents which denies us the right to ship food material to another belligerent with which we are at peace is equally certain. I am in sympathy with these petitioners and with the million others who have not thus spoken to the Senate. I trust their prayer will not fall on deaf committee ears. I believe, however, that its proper reference is to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The subject matter to which these petitions refer is there. It is being considered, or at least should be considered, by that committee. I hope that committee will consider it and present it to the Senate for action at an early date. It is right to the Senate that this should be done. There should be a full and free discussion, and such can only be obtained through a committee report submitted to the Senate.

It seems to me that a reference to the Commerce Committee, where nothing pertinent to the subject is pending, would be wrong. The Committee on Foreign Relations has complete jurisdiction of the subject, and it should receive the request which a million people of the United States have asked of Congress. I am not suggesting precipitate action, but I am insisting that serious consideration be given to this all-important matter, to the end that the United States Congress take steps as American rights and duties require.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss the petition itself. I will state, however, that my sympathies have been that the Government of the United States being the great neutral country of the world should have undertaken, in the first place, to prohibit the exportation of munitions of war to belligerent countries. I was in favor of the embargo that was placed upon the exportation of munitions of war into Mexico by President Taft. I deplored the lifting by President Wilson of that embargo, as I told the President in person. The question of a prohibition at this late date will meet difficulties that would not have been met if a prohibition had been imposed at the beginning of the war, and might perhaps be very embarrassing for our country to enforce.

But, Mr. President, I rose to say a few words about the ruling of the Chair, because I fully agree with all that has been said by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I am not going over the ground again, but I want to call attention to the ruling of the present occupant of the chair. Under the head of morning business, page 173 of the Precedents, on June 21, 1913:

During the morning hour, Mr. NORRIS moved to refer a communication from the Attorney General to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas objected to debate.

* * * * * * *

The VICE PRESIDENT (Mr. Marshall). The Chair holds that during the morning hour the motion is not debatable. The Chair will state for the information of the Senator from Nebraska that the Chair rules that the communication from the Attorney General can lie on the table, and the Senator from Nebraska can call it up at the proper time and proceed to discuss it.

Mr. NORRIS. In order to get the parliamentary situation settled for future reference, when it may be desirable to enforce this rule, if it is to be established, I want to inquire in the best of faith if a motion to refer a communication to a committee after the morning hour is debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 2117, 2118.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has broadened his knowledge since then.

Mr. SMOOT. I think, Mr. President, the ruling of the Chair at that time was perfectly right. I am jealous of preserving the rights of the Senate in attending to its necessary business during the morning hour. If the present ruling stands, any morning can be consumed by a Senator moving to refer a petition that he is not interested in in the least and cares nothing about; and the whole of the morning hour could be taken up in the discussion of that motion.

It is for that reason, Mr. President, that I appeal to the Senate now to express itself upon this subject, knowing full well what it means for the future conduct of the business of this body.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have no intention now, as I stated when on the floor a short time since, to debate the merits of the question of placing an embargo on the shipment of arms and munitions of war or anything to any foreign country. I have some opinions upon that question, but I have not thought that this was the proper time or occasion for a debate upon the subject. There is nothing before the Senate of an affirmative character. The proposed legislation itself has been introduced and referred.

I was apprehensive when the Senator from Iowa suggested in presenting these petitions that there were two or three Senators who desired to speak for two or three minutes each. I did not object. There were petitions presented, signed, as I have been informed, by a very large number of American citizens, mostly women, I understand, but no doubt by a number of men also, relating to a subject of great public interest. I did not feel disposed under the circumstances to object to a brief discussion, although the time for discussion did not, as I thought, seem opportune just now. I feared then that what so often happens when we are promised that only a few moments will be occupied in doing something out of the rules, and the doing of which requires unanimous consent, expressed or implied, might result in the consumption of a large part of the morning hour, if not the whole of it. Instead of taking 6 or 8 minutes or 10 minutes, it has taken an hour and a half. The morning business has lost its place.

Mr. President, I pass from that subject now and will say just a word on the appeal I have taken from the ruling of the Chair. Undoubtedly—I think I can say undoubtedly—the purpose and policy of the rules when they were adopted and as they have been administered were to preserve the morning hour to the uses to which it was to be devoted. To say that a petition, which under the rule in express terms must be referred without debate, may be made a debatable question by a mere motion to refer is in effect an evasion of the rule. As the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] suggests to me, it is not only an evasion, but a nullification of the rule.

Of course, the Chair understands without assurance that in asking, as I do by the appeal, to have the Senate itself pass on this question, it is done only in a kindly spirit, so far as the Chair is concerned, but I regard it as a matter of such far-reaching importance that we ought to be very careful about adopting that ruling, for we should thereby establish a precedent that would come home, Senators, all through the future years to plague the Senate, unless the rules themselves should be changed.

Mr. President, it endangers the business of the Senate—important business transacted in the morning hour—and I think it ought not to be done. A practice of that kind would be violative of the spirit, and I think also of the language, of the rule.

Therefore I have appealed, so as to get the judgment of the Senate upon it, whether or not the reference of a petition is debatable, and, coupling them as one question, whether a motion then made to refer is debatable.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I have great respect for the rules of the Senate; I have a great desire to see the Senate's business conducted in accordance with those rules; I have great respect for the morning hour; but I think that there are things for which the ordinary business of the morning hour—introducing bridge bills or public-building bills and things of that sort—may well be laid aside in the consideration of the greater questions that confront us.

I believe that the Chair is absolutely correct in his ruling that a motion to refer a petition, even though it be made in the morning hour, is debatable, and I think that is true, particularly upon an occasion of this sort, when it is a public question of the most momentous importance, as the Senator says. When are we to discuss these public questions of great importance? Has there one come before the Senate?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment, I shall not speak more than a minute, and the Senator does not want to waste too much time——

Mr. STONE. I want to ask the Senator a question; that is all. I ask the Senator if he does not remember that a number of speeches have been already made before the Senate, and at great length, on this very subject of an embargo?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, the Senator pointed to the clock a moment ago. I desire to say that more time has been consumed on the appeal of the Senator than was consumed on the discussion of the main question. When are we to have any opportunity to discuss these public questions? The Senator rises in his seat day after day and says the time is not opportune; that it is inappropriate; that these matters of great public importance must not be discussed in the Senate either in the morning hour or at any other time; that they must all be referred to a committee without discussion and that the merits of them must not be inquired into. Does the committee give us time for discussion?

Mr. STONE. I never said such a thing on the floor of the Senate or elsewhere.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator from Missouri for the past three weeks has been complaining of discussion in the Senate and has sought by argument, or at least by expression, to prevent discussion on the floor of the Senate, insisting that the time is too valuable; and at the same time the Senate adjourns for two or three days when all these great public questions are before the Senate and the country; and they are referred to committees. When will the committees give us some action on these questions?

I am not reflecting now upon the Committee on Foreign Relations, but I do say that it is trying the patience of the Senate when, not only for weeks, but for months and for years, resolutions have been pending touching great public affairs of this Nation and we are told to wait until the proper time comes for their discussion, while the resolutions and the bills in the meantime are reposing in the confidence and the secrecy of the committee.

I think, Mr. President, that the Chair is absolutely correct in his ruling, and I hope that the ruling will be sustained.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I sincerely hope that the decision of the Chair will be sustained. I believe that it is sound and that it is supported by authority and precedent.

But, sir, I trust that the Chair will be sustained for another and broader reason.

For 300 years the right of petition has been regarded as a sacred popular right. The framers of the Constitution sought to preserve the right to the people. The Constitution seems to guarantee to citizens the certain opportunity to have direct speech with their representative in Congress by petition. But the rules of the Senate make the right of petition little more than a sham and a mockery. Petitions are received without reading and referred without debate to a committee. That ends it. Petitions representing the arduous labor of months, expressing the hopes and convictions and prayers of thousands of people, are brought to the doors of this Chamber in the belief that they will receive the considerate attention of this body. They reach the Clerk's desk, are noted of record, and then go their way swiftly to the lasting silence of the committee's rubbish room.

Senators express the fear that if the ruling of the Chair is sustained every Senator thereafter presenting a petition will move its reference to some committee, and on that motion proceed to take up the time of the Senate debating the merits of the petition.

Mr. President, such fears are groundless. It will doubtless afford opportunity to bring a petition of special importance to the attention of the Senate. If it does this it will make the constitutional right of petition of some value to the people of the country and thereby subserve the public interest. Any attempt to abuse a privilege which a Senator would have in thus bringing to the notice of the Senate a petition of no concern to the country would defeat its own aims. But, sir, the petition before the Senate this morning justifies the severest condemnation of the rule and the practice of the Senate, which in effect have operated to abolish the right of petition.

This petition speaks the mind and makes appeal for more than a million people. It cries out against the mercenary spirit that would coin the honor of our country into profits for the manufacturers of arms and ammunitions.

And it can only find expression through petition.

The subsidized press of the country is no indication of what the plain people are thinking. We should therefore give the largest possible consideration and weight to any other avenues of expression of which the people avail themselves. But out among the plain folk, let me say to you, there is a different speech. It was my privilege a little while ago to speak at St. Paul to 7,000 farmers, drawn from Montana, the two Dakotas, northern Iowa, Minnesota, and northern Wisconsin.

This body of representative farmers adopted resolutions condemning the preparedness program. Their action was not prearranged. It was spontaneous and unanimous. I believe they voiced the calm judgment of the agricultural population of the Middle West.

Mr. President, it is conceded that the manufacture and shipment of arms and munitions of war is within the accepted precedents and principles of international law as heretofore construed and maintained by this country and by most of the other countries of the world.

But, sir, never before in history has traffic in arms with belligerents had the significance that the shipment of munitions of war by us to Europe has to-day. The maintenance of that right by us has given the breath of life and perpetuity to a war that recognizes no compromise or finish except mutual extermination.

In the face of such a struggle, involving more than half the people of the world, which has already sacrificed 14,000,000 lives, precedents must yield to the appeal of a common humanity.

In my judgment, this petition is most significant as an expression of the sentiment of the masses of men and women of the United States.

After the first great horror to the plain people of this country of the war came the shock of learning that we are supplying the arms and ammunition to maintain it.

Those who assume that the average man and woman have become hardened to what is transpiring, that they go about their daily work unthinking and unmoved by the fact that the money power of America is reaping fabulous profits from the awful destruction of fellow men in Europe—those who make this assumption are mistaken. This monster petition is a demonstration of that fact.

The people of the East and, perhaps, of the populous centers of the West, under the influences of the financial, commercial, and industrial pressure, may appear to have caught the war fever and to be overwhelmed with fear of attack and mad for preparedness. But the great undercurrent of opinion of the common folk is one of solemn protest and indignation.

During the months that I was on the platform this summer I found the almost universal sentiment of my audiences to be of gratitude that we have been kept out of war, and a no less universal desire for some other way of settling international troubles than war.

The average man does not understand why the United States Congress and this administration are so indifferent to the world situation. I fully realize the enormous difficulties, but I believe that history will hold us accountable for our contribution to the general holocaust, and I think it will be hard for future generations to understand why the neutral powers kept aloof; why they did not unite, under the leadership of the United States, in an effort to restore peace and order. I believe, too, that if one-tenth part of the energy and time now directed in agitation and investigation of preparedness were to be turned toward other means of settlement of international problems for the future we should restore the confidence of the people and redeem our place in history.

This petition, although it relates more particularly to one phase of our responsiblity, is a call to action. It should be heeded as an appeal for the higher statesmanship that these times demand.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not want the opportunity to pass without taking advantage of the moment to say that I believe in the right of petition as much as any man who ever lived, and that the rules of this body can never prevent the discussion of any subject that may be brought to the attention of the Senate through a petition. After the morning hour, which would perhaps have closed a few minutes after 12 o'clock, any Senator in this body could have spoken the remainder of the day upon the petition presented by the Senator from Iowa. No Senator could possibly be denied that privilege; I never would want him to be denied it; and I never would support a ruling that would in any way deny him that right. A petition of this kind, as the Senator from Wisconsin has said, is indeed quite different from one that may be presented coming from an individual interested in an ordinary subject in regard to which he desires to appeal to Congress. Even the one citizen has the right to have presented such a petition; and, not only that, if he can interest a Senator of the United States to bring it to the attention of the people through the Senate, not one day but a month, if that one Senator can occupy the attention and the time of the Senate so long, can be consumed by him in discussing the subject in which that one citizen is interested.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is, on this particular occasion, after the routine business has been pursued and completed and after this petition had been carted away to the oblivion of some committee to which it might be referred, then, if I understand the Senator, he means that when the Philippines bill or some other bill came before the Senate some Senator, after the occasion passed, with the interest passed, might rise and by the indulgence of the Senate, address himself to the principle involved in this petition when it was considering some other subject. Does the Senator conceive that to be a hearing upon a petition?

Mr. SMOOT. Not necessarily, Mr. President, the situation described by the Senator. The Senator must not feel that if these petitions were referred to a committee they would be carted into oblivion. The subject matter of these petitions, Mr. President, is one so grave that the mere reference of them to a committee can not place them in oblivion. The subject matter of these petitions will be discussed upon this floor during the next two or three months, not for one day, but perhaps for weeks.

I say to you, Mr. President, and to all the country that it is a most important subject, and I know that not only are the million who have signed the petitions interested in the matter, but that other millions in the United States are likewise interested. Mr. President, as far as I am concerned in this matter, that what I said about the rule I fully believe to be not only the rule of the body but its practice; and when I vote not to sustain the ruling of the Chair at this time I want it distinctly understood that I am not voting with reference to the petition or the subject of the petition in any way.

I simply wanted to say that much because I did not want to be placed in a wrong attitude before the people of the United States. It is for that reason, and that only, that I speak at this time, and I vote as I shall because I believe the rule to be as I have stated. Not only do I believe the rule to be that way, but it has been the practice. Through the rule and by the practice of the Senate no man or woman in the United States can ever be denied the right of petition or ever be denied a hearing upon this floor, if our rules are adhered to by this body.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have listened with some attention to what Senators who antagonize the ruling of the Chair have had to say without being convinced that the opinion I have heretofore expressed is erroneous.

The force of the argument seems to be that the rule announced by the Chair would destroy the morning hour. The morning hour is habitually destroyed by taking a recess from the day before whenever the exigencies of the occasion seem to demand such action. It is within the recollection of all Senators that it is likewise habitually set aside by the unanimous consent of the Senate on nearly every day for the purpose of considering, by unanimous consent, uncontested bills that are presented by the committees.

The rule is not likely to become abused, for the reason that it is at all times under the control of the Senate. If a motion to refer is made for captious purposes, or for purposes to delay, a motion to lay it on the table will take the whole matter out of the control of the Senate, if that is the wish of the Senate. There is not any possible force in the suggestion that we are deliberately abolishing the morning hour simply because we allow reasonable debate on a proposititon to refer, or to take a matter from one committee and refer it to another, because the particular question now before the Senate is this:

The Chair announced that under the practice it would be proper to refer the petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations, but that he would recognize the Senator from Nebraska for the purpose of making a motion to refer the petition to the Committee on Commerce. The logical effect of that was a motion to discharge the Committee on Foreign Relations from the further consideration of the subject and substitute the judgment of the Senate, if it should ratify the motion of the Senator from Nebraska. Everybody concedes that that motion, made in that form, by observing those formalities, would be debatable.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows that that motion could not be made in the morning hour.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator does not know any such thing. If he did, he would not be talking as he is talking now.

As the Chair properly said, it is a matter that is in confusion if we take the simple text of any one of the three rules that bear on the subject. The Chair is doing now what has been done for a hundred years—formulating a sensible and enforceable rule that in proper cases will extend a proper remedy. Whenever the abuse of it is to be dealt with, I take it for granted that the same ingenuity which the Senate always has exercised on such occasions will relieve it from any serious embarrassment.

I think the ruling of the Chair is right, and I intend to vote to sustain it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. KENYON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Beckham	Hitchcock	Newlands	Smoot
Borah	Hollis	Norris	Sterling
Brandegee	Hughes	O'Gorman	Stone

Mr. TOWNSEND. The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I desire that this announcement may stand on all votes for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I am requested to announce that the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is unavoidably detained from the Senate, and that the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is detained on account of sickness.

Mr. STONE. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] on account of illness. He is paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have been requested to announce the absence of the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] owing to illness in his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, inasmuch as something like two hours have been taken up in debate, and I imagine all Senators who desire to express themselves on the general subject embodied in the proposed legislation have said what they wished to say, not desiring now to further detain the Senate, I will, with the consent of the Senate, withdraw the appeal, stating, however, that I challenge and protest against the ruling, and that on some future occasion when the question arises I shall be glad to debate the matter again before the Chair and the Senate and ask the judgment of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Before the record is finally made the Chair desires to announce, in connection with the ruling, that the Chair is not of the opinion that the ruling of the Chair made on June 21, 1913, is at all in conflict with the ruling made to-day. That ruling was in connection with a communication from the Attorney General of the United States, and was neither a petition nor a memorial.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion to refer the petition to the Committee on Commerce, and I leave the matter to the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will refer the petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I send to the desk a very short letter, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the letter was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

BERLIN, December 18, 1915.

Senator HOKE SMITH, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: As our association has stood, and still stands, for the development and promotion of American trade with Germany, we take the liberty of bringing the two following cases to your notice.

We have since outbreak of the war had several instances where American goods have been held up by the British Government, causing our American branches in Germany a great deal of trouble. If this policy is continued, the offices of our American houses will have to close business.

One of the two very flagrant cases we are sending you to-day is the complaint of the representative of the John B. Stetson Co., of Philadelphia—members of ours—in which we are informed that goods will not be accepted in New York by the steamship companies for transportation unless certified to by a sworn statement that such goods will not go to Germany or the central powers. The John B. Stetson Co. have until recently been able to get their goods through to Germany via the Scandinavian countries.

The second complaint is that of our member, the Remington Typewriter Co., which company has succeeded in getting its goods as far as Goteborg, but can not honestly make a sworn statement that the goods are not intended for Germany. One very interesting fact in connection with this latter case is that these goods, being some hundred cases of typewriters, are allowed to go to Russia.

We would also call your attention to the fact that the British Government, in refusing to allow these goods to enter Germany, is striking a blow at American trade and only assisting German typewriter firms to better compete with the American product.

We are well aware that you must be flooded with similar requests from our American firms, but as these two firms are well known all over the United States, we think you might be able to make good use of these two cases and possibly bring the matter before Congress.

If this policy continues to be pursued by Great Britain, it will in very short time completely ruin American trade in Germany and Austria, which it has required many years of hard work and painstaking to build up.

Knowing, as we do, that you take great interest in this matter, and trusting that any efforts you may make will create a more favorable situation, as we take the standpoint that United States manufacturers have the perfect right to do business with any belligerent, provided the products in question are not contraband.

We have the honor to remain,

Very truly, yours,

AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE AND TRADE,
GEO. S. ATWOOD, Secretary.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of the Layman's Missionary Association of Duluth, Minn., remonstrating against the repeal of the treaty of 1855 prohibiting the sale of intoxicants in certain territory in the State of Minnesota, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Commercial Club of Little Falls, Minn., remonstrating against a tax on gasoline, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have a letter from Mr. J. D. Goldman, president of the Lesser-Goldman Cotton Co., of St. Louis, Mo., in regard to the cotton-futures act, and with especial reference to section 11 of that act. I ask that the letter may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ST. LOUIS, MO., January 15, 1916.

Hon. JOS. T. ROBINSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In regard to the cotton-futures act which has been reintroduced in the House by Mr. LEVER, section 11 of the bill forbids sending orders to buy or sell futures on the foreign exchanges, and, in consequence, the European merchants are given such an advantage that it is possible for them to monopolize the export business, which amounts to 60 per cent of the American cotton crop.

In consequence of this, the American cotton merchant hereafter can deal only with the European merchant by reason of the fact that he can not deal direct with the consumer abroad, as the consumers abroad buy for forward deliveries, and always buy based on Liverpool or Havre futures, and if we sell cotton abroad for forward delivery the natural hedge is the market in which we sell the cotton and not in the New York or New Orleans markets, which in no way reflect the variations in exchange, freights, etc.

We also do not see how we can continue to ship cotton to Europe for sale on or after arrival, for the reason that if we ship or hedge in New York we run the risk of the freight and exchange markets between the time the cotton is shipped and sold, and, as freights are seven times higher than normal values, this is a risk no one wants to undertake.

Consequently the effect of section 11 is as follows:

First. European merchants are given a monopoly of the European business, competition is restricted, and prices are affected in this country.

Second. By reason of the fact that the American merchants can not do a forward business and are unwilling to ship cotton to Liverpool on consignment and hedge in this country, exports are obstructed, and the surplus of the crop is remaining in this country and affecting prices.

LESSER-GOLDMAN COTTON CO.,
COTTON BUYERS,
112–114 South Main Street, St. Louis, Mo., January 15, 1916.

Hon. J. T. ROBINSON:

We are inclosing you an example of a transaction showing clearly the injustice done to an American cotton merchant, who is obliged under the Lever bill to hedge in New York.

This bill affects the cotton merchant in this way: They have many times during the season opportunities to buy in the interior on a safe Liverpool basis, and if they can do so they would take the cotton off the market and sell in Liverpool against their purchases; but, as the Lever bill prohibits this, they are obliged to stay out of the market and the cotton then becomes a weight until such time as the American mills may want it or there is an outlet from some other source. As the mills generally know the amount of cotton left in the country they take their time about buying, and for that reason it very often depresses values, as the cotton merchant can not relieve the situation unless he can insure himself by covers against loss.

As this bill in its present form is so obviously unfair to the American cotton merchant, we are writing you to call your attention to the objectionable feature of the bill and ask you to vote for the elimination of section 11 when the bill is again presented, leaving the rest of the bill intact.

Yours, very truly,

LESSER-GOLDMAN COTTON CO.,
By J. D. GOLDMAN, President.

THE NAVY.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that to-morrow, Friday, the 28th instant, after the conclusion of the routine morning business, I shall address the Senate on the subject of the Navy.

GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 381.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 381) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands.

[Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am very sorry that the Senator from Arkansas has seen fit in his wisdom to propose this very radical amendment to this very well-considered bill, a bill which has not only been considered in the present Senate Committee on the Philippines, but in the Senate Committee on the Philippines of the preceding Congress, and which, substantially in its present form, passed the House of Representatives after full consideration by the committee there.

I recognize, Mr. President, however, that there is—particularly on this side of the Chamber—a strong sentiment favorable to the idea which this amendment proposes to enact. It is apparently an impulsive and rather thoughtless sentiment in favor of getting rid of the Philippines regardless of the consequences, regardless of the history of the past 15 years, regardless of the interests over there which have become vested under American control, and regardless of the international results which are likely to follow. Out of deference to that sentiment on this side of the Chamber, I propose to-day particularly to point out what I consider to be some very serious defects in the pending amendment, even if it is proposed to enact it.

I ask the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to what I shall say in the nature of an analysis of the amendment that he proposes. First, let me draw attention to the difference between the bill and the amendment. The bill proposes to carry out the past policy of the United States with regard to the Philippine Islands by giving to the people of the Philippines a larger degree of self-government than they have ever had in their history before. It also proposes in the preamble to give to the Philippine people the pledge of the United States that some day it is the intention of the United States to bestow independence upon them when their permanent interests require it.

Now, I shall not discuss the reasons for that phraseology in the preamble. I may say to the Senate that the committees that considered the preamble found great difficulty in agreeing on the phraseology, and that the phraseology finally adopted was in the nature of a compromise in order to come as near as possible to harmonizing the different views of Senators, and with the view all the time of conveying to the Philippine people such a promise as would satisfy them with the present legislation, and such a promise as would lead them on in the course of the development of self-government to higher and higher standards. But that preamble I shall not consider.

Let me now draw attention to the amendment, which is really the pending question before the Senate. The Senator from Arkansas first drew his amendment so that it would result in the separation of the Philippine Islands from the United States within two years. He soon found, after he had presented it and discussed it informally, that that would not do. He soon found that that was impracticable.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Let me say to the Senator I did not change two years to four years as a result of any attention I gave the subject. I think two years amply sufficient now, but I had to conform to the views of other Senators. If anybody is responsible for that, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will change it. I will say the Senator from Arkansas soon found that it was necessary to change the amendment, just as I think I can demonstrate to him it will be necessary to change the present amendment, either to secure votes for it or to comply with obligations which I am sure the Senator from Arkansas will recognize when I point them out.

First, he provides in his amendment that the President, within four years, must act, unless after the four years have expired he finds conditions such that he should not act. The Senator evidently intends to say that the President shall act within four years, unless some time during the four-year period he finds he should not act before the limit arrives. There is a slight change which he must make if he would make his amendment workable.

The President of the United States is required by this mandatory provision to act within four years; and yet it is said that after the four years have expired, if he finds at that time, after he has failed to comply with the law, he may then find a reason for not complying with it and submit it to Congress. He evidently intends, I am sure, to provide that if the President finds at any time during the four years——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. No; the Senator is entirely mistaken. It is contemplated that there will be some strife among political parties. It may go beyond permissible lengths; it may be to-morrow. It may arise and disappear before the expiration of the four years; but if there is a continuing condition such as to warrant the President in saying it is likely to grow infinitely worse, and in growing worse involve upon us the exercise of authority, to give time to submit it to another Congress, to see whether or not it is necessary to somewhat modify the rule laid down in existing law.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But the Senator does not submit it to Congress.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Congress needs no right. The President has a right to submit to Congress anything he desires to submit at any time. It is not necessary to confer this by statute. On the other hand, Congress can take up the whole subject, without reference to the President or anybody else, at any session of Congress, this one included.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator intend by his amendment that the President may submit it at any time?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. No; it simply affords Congress an opportunity to take it up without the President. It is not necessary to submit it in order to confer jurisdiction on Congress to deal with it again.

The amendment itself settles that. That answers the question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the President fails to act within four years, he has violated this act.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes; if he fails to act in four years and does not extend the time, he has violated the act and violated his oath of office.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then you compel him to violate the act before he submits it to Congress.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. We do not compel him to submit it to Congress. He issues a proclamation extending the policy.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But you compel him to violate the act.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I do not know what the Senator means by that.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I can not believe that the Senator from Arkansas realizes what the Senator from Nebraska means, because it is very plain that the intent of the Senator from Arkansas is not covered by the language of the act.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is rather a minor matter, and I shall proceed to the next difficulty. Under the amendment which the Senator offers the President is only permitted to submit this question again to Congress in case the interests of the Philippines make it desirable.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. No; it does not say that. It says if he shall find as a fact that the condition of the internal or external affairs of the Philippines in respect to the stability or efficiency of the proposed government would warrant him in so doing.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am sure the Senator ought to include in that, whether it is his intention or not, a direction to the President of the United States to submit the matter to Congress if he finds that the interests of the United States makes it mandatory.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The supposition is that we shall have the services of the able Senator from Nebraska before the five years run out, and if the interest of the United States is jeopardized in the slightest degree he will not fail to exercise his constitutional function.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Later on I can tell the Senator from Arkansas better whether I will be here in five years, but the amendment as drawn by the Senator takes into account nothing but the interest of the Philippine Islands and makes no provision for the President submitting the matter to Congress in case he should find it vitally necessary for the interest of the American people. He expects the President to live up to this act. He expects the President to carry out its terms. Should he not include a direction to the President to lay the matter before Congress if he finds it either to the interest of the Philippine Islands or of the American people?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The reply to the Senator's question is that I do not direct the President ever to submit it to Congress at any time or under any circumstances. It would simply force Congress to take it up. If it sees proper to do so——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will read the language:

Provided, That if the President, at the expiration of the said period of four years, shall find that the condition of the internal or external affairs of said Philippines in respect to the stability or efficiency of the proposed government thereof is such as to warrant him in so doing, he is hereby further authorized, by proclamation duly made and published, to extend the said time to and including the date of the final adjournment of the session of Congress which shall convene next after the date of the expiration of the said period of four years.

Now, I ask the Senator, suppose the President of the United States found it vitally necessary for the interests of the United States that this period should be extended?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If he did his duty and observed his oath he would submit it to Congress, if it required congressional action.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Why has not the Senator included that here?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I have not directed him to submit anything. I simply give him an opportunity to take it up.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Arkansas has given the power to extend the period, if the interests of the Philippines demand it, but he has not given the President the power to extend the period if the interests of the United States demand it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator is entirely mistaken about that. The phrase he is criticizing is the work of probably the best lawyer on this floor, and he is not a supporter of this amendment, either. It is the delegation of power to the President to suspend an existing law, and it must be carefully done. There is very little latitude allowed in cases of that kind. That would be the only reason the President would have for extending it, because it is the only reason that can exist. As long as we are responsible for governmental conditions in the Philippine Islands nothing could happen there that would disturb the internal or external relations of that country without involving the United States, and the thing that would present one condition would present the other. I did not think it was necessary to amplify something that by implication is so plainly provided for.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator in his amendment gives the President the power to extend the period one year if the interest of the Philippine Islands demands it, but he has not permitted the President to extend it five minutes in case the interest of the United States demands it. I think that is an omission which clearly should be made good, if the amendment is to be voted upon with a view to the interest of the United States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, does the Senator from Nebraska recognize the fact that we are going to have at least four sessions of Congress between now and the time when the four-year limit will be up? Of course, if the President of the United States finds that there is any interest of the United States that should be protected he has those four years before the time of his proclamation to call the attention of the Senate and House and ask for their advice or their consideration of the same.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am very well aware that Congresses will come and go before this period of four years elapses, and for that very reason I think this Congress should not undertake to fix a date. I think it should leave it as it left it in the case of Cuba. I think any attempt to fix a date in advance is a dangerous exercise of power. We do not know what the four years will bring forth.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield further to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. One of the main objects of fixing the date is to assure the Philippine people that they will get their independence. There is always a feeling of unrest where it is uncertain as to whether they will get their independence. They are unanimous about it, and if it is hedged around with too many ifs and ands the result will be that they will come to the conclusion that the United States does not intend to give them independence. That produces unrest, it produces conditions which are bad, and it might even produce revolution or insurrection. We do not want to have——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I can not yield for a speech.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yielded for a reasonable interruption. I realize that the amendment is an attempt to fix a definite date, but it does not do it. There is still a string tied to it, a string which the President is to pull. Even under this amendment the Philippine people may not have their independence for 20 years. It is not made definite. In my opinion the preamble which is presented to the Senate by the committee, and for which the Senator from Colorado voted, and which I supposed had his approval, is a preamble which once adopted binds the United States much more firmly to a policy of independence than this amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas is adopted the Philippine people will get their independence without further congressional action, unless Congress should change its policy in the future?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Whereas if the preamble, as suggested by the Senator, were adopted that would not be true?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; they would get their independence.

Mr. HARDWICK. But not without further affirmative congressional action?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is true; but Congress would be morally bound to give it.

Mr. HARDWICK. The action in the one case——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is that difference. It is not an absolute grant of independence.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to state to the Senator from Nebraska that I did vote for the preamble because, under the conditions that existed in the committee, it was about the best that we could get. The Senator knows from the various expressions that I made during the proceedings of the committee that I was always in favor of a stronger preamble than we produced, but as a matter of compromise we did as a matter of fact agree to it, reserving, however, the right to make liberal amendments when it came to the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is true, Mr. President, except as to the reservation. I supposed that the members of the committee on this side of the Chamber at least would be bound by the committee report.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; at the very time the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] said that they wanted to reserve the right to amend I stated that I did not suppose anyone was bound as to this matter. We were trying to get an early report to the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, Mr. President, I proceed to the third point of criticism of this amendment. It provides that the Philippine government shall protect and guarantee personal and property rights of Americans. It makes no provision, no condition, that the new government set up there shall not be recognized until it protects and guarantees the rights of other nationalities in the islands. Yet, Mr. President, we as a Nation are not only morally bound to do so but we are specifically bound to do so by the terms of the treaty of Paris. If this is an amendment which my friends on this side of the Chamber desire to engraft upon the bill, they should at least take the precautions which were taken in regard to Cuba and provide in this amendment that no government should be recognized there until it had bound itself to guarantee not only American rights in the islands but other rights which have become vested under the protection of the American flag, rights which we have solemnly promised Spain in the treaty of Paris we would see were protected.

I certainly think that the Senator from Arkansas can hardly be willing to leave his amendment in such a shape as not to protect those rights, compelling the President to recognize a government in the Philippine Islands before he has secured from it sufficient guaranties for the protection of the rights of other nationalities in those islands, rights which are as good as American rights.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator need not consume any time on that proposition. I am perfectly willing, in the line where it says "citizens or corporations of the United States," to insert the words "or others." I do not believe other nations expect us, in dealing with a sovereign—as I hope to see the Philippine Islands before long—to take care of their own interests. I believe they can do that in the Philippines. They generally do that elsewhere for themselves. If it will obviate the necessity of discussing it, I have no objection to putting in the words "or others."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am glad to hear the Senator say these are rights we ought to protect.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. We ought to protect the Philippines as far as we can so long as we stay there and protect our own rights.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, is it possible the President of the United States will not protect rights without specifying in a provision that he shall do it? It is absurd.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In answer to that, I may say the Congress of the United States did not leave this matter as it stands in the case of Cuba. The Congress of the United States instructed its agents to require of the constitutional convention of Cuba that it should enter into certain obligations to do the things which I think we should now require the new government in the Philippine Islands to do. It is easy to frame a bill or an amendment and make it general in its terms, but when a great Nation like the United States has assumed solemn treaty obligations I think those treaty obligations should be provided for in every act of legislation by which American sovereignty is relinquished over the islands.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, there is no question but that those rights ought to be guaranteed, and there is no doubt in my mind that the President will require that guaranty. You can not specify in an amendment or in a bill every detail and every step necessary. We know that any President will want to protect not only citizens of the United States but citizens of any foreign country. So, even if there was no guaranty or any expression whatever, I have not any doubt that, in the interest of the Filipinos themselves, protection would be extended to them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The trouble is the Senator forgets that the Senator from Arkansas in this amendment has undertaken to specify the things that the President shall require of a new Philippine government, and he has omitted the very treaty obligation that we are solemnly bound to perform.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator need not take any more time on that, if he is willing to be satisfied with the suggestion I now make, and that is to add, after the words "United States," in line 3, page 3, the words "and others," so as to read "and safeguard all of the personal and property rights of citizens or corporations of the United States or others resident or engaged in business in said Philippines or having property interests therein."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think it should be more specific than that, because our guaranties to Spain are more specific than that.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. We do not need to duplicate it in a statute.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We did in the statute we passed relating to Cuba give very specific and elaborate directions to the constitutional convention of Cuba. Those directions were sent direct to that constitutional convention, and it was required to place them in the constitution which the Cuban people adopted.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. No; but we did not require the Cuban people to assume to pay the debts Spain had contracted on behalf of Cuba. We left that saddled on Spain, and she has had to pay it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We did whatever we were under any treaty obligations to do. That is all there is in this case.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I do not want to mix in this transaction any idea that we have got to ask the consent of anybody to do anything we want to do. We have a treaty obligation with Spain and we will meet it according to its spirit and meaning. We do not want to have our hands tied so that we can not legislate according to the powers of Congress, simply because some imaginary difficulty will hereafter arise with some other country.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me read some of the obligations we took to Spain in the treaty of Paris:

> Spanish subjects, natives of the peninsula, residing in the Territory over which Spain by the present treaty relinquishes or cedes her sovereignty, may remain in such Territory or may remove therefrom, retaining in either event all their rights of property, including the right to sell or dispose of such property or of its proceeds; and they shall also have the right to carry on their industry, commerce, and professions, being subject in respect thereof to such laws as are applicable to other foreigners.

Is it proper in our act permitting the President to make a treaty with the new government of the Philippine Islands to simply guarantee Americans in their rights and fail to guarantee the rights of Spaniards and other foreigners?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator is a lawyer and he understands that the document from which he is reading speaks of the obligation of one party to it to another. There is not any limitation upon the power of the United States to get out of the islands and turn that government over to another government. It is simply a stipulation that the United States will not deny any of the things granted there. If, when the Philippine Islands become an independent republic, it is violating any of those regulations or stipulations it will then be the proper occasion for Spain to make representations to the Philippine Islands and have them corrected in the usual way.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Philippine people can only become an independent people by the consent of the United States, and we, in giving that consent, should make it a condition that they shall carry out and observe to the letter all the solemn obligations we took to Spain.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Then they are not independent. The very idea of independence is the privilege of doing wrong if you want to do it, subject to your responsibility. To stay there and say that the Philippines shall carry out every contract we ever made would not be to grant them independence.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Article 10——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. It seems to me the Senator from Nebraska has now reached a very interesting point. His argument inevitably leads to the conclusion that we must ask the consent of Spain before we leave the islands.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose Spain should say we are willing to take the obligation of the United States that these things should be done, but we are entirely unwilling to take the obligation of the government in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not at all. We shall simply, in relinquishing the sovereignty which we got from Spain, relinquish it upon the condition that the power to which we relinquish it shall carry out the obligations which we assumed. We did in Cuba exactly that thing. We required the new Cuban Government to undertake the same obligations. For instance, here is another article in the treaty of Paris:

> The inhabitants of the territory over which Spain relinquishes or cedes her sovereignty shall be secured in the free exercise of their religion.

Suppose a new government set up there should undertake to interfere with that; we would have put that new government into existence, and before we put it into existence we should obligate it to carry out exactly the obligations which we had assumed.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will yield for just one moment, I wish to ask, suppose we kept up that and the new government went along and did those things anyhow, how could we be held responsible for it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Because we had created it; we have an absolute sovereignty there at the present time, an unquestioned sovereignty.

Mr. HARDWICK. In other words, then, we would have no right to leave them?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We would have the right to leave them if we required them to sign an obligation to make good the promises we had made.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then, suppose they did not?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, we would have the power to enforce it; but if we go out of there without making them assume that obligation, we shall have no power to enforce it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Would the Senator agree to the amendment if there should be inserted in it language to the effect that we shall require that all the obligations that the United States Government has agreed to with Spain shall be agreed to by the Philippine people?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That would make the amendment a great deal better, and it may be that I shall be brought to the point of supporting it, but I certainly can not support it in its present shape. That is only one of the criticisms I have to make of it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I sympathize with a great deal that the Senator from Nebraska has said, but I should like to know whether I understand him correctly to say that when the United States shall part with the Philippine Islands, surrender all its sovereignty over the islands, and when an independent government shall be set up by the Filipino people, the United States will be still bound to see that the stipulations of the treaty entered into between the United States and Spain are carried out by the government of the Philippine Islands? Is that the position of the Senator?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, my position is that we ought at least to make them promise to observe our obligations.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The question is whether we would be bound. If that is true, it is rather an unfortunate condition. The Senator, if I understand him, would try——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They may violate American rights there, and there may come a question whether we shall step in and protect American rights; but we certainly owe to them as much obligation to carry out these treaty promises as we do to American citizens who have gone in there under our flag, and we can not in honor dodge those obligations.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will bear with me, this treaty between ourselves and Spain is binding upon the Governments of those two countries; and when we leave the Philippines, whether we surrender them to the people of the islands themselves or whether we turn them over to some other country, whatever we may do with them when we finally leave them and surrender our sovereignty, our responsibility to Spain under the treaty has entirely ended. Those stipulations are not in the nature of covenants running with the land, and they are not covenants that bind us after we have parted with the land, as it seems to me.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the responsibility of the Filipinos continues.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from North Dakota suggests that the responsibility of the Filipinos continues. It does not as to this treaty, because the treaty was not made between the Filipinos and Spain.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We secured the sovereignty over the Philippines by treaty with the power that had that sovereignty, and in making that treaty we entered into certain obligations with respect to the Spanish citizens of that country. I can not conceive that the Senator from Utah would be willing to turn them over to a comparatively irresponsible power, without making the stipulation that our promises should be carried out. The Spaniards are still there; the business still continues. Would the Senator omit that from the amendment, and thus invite the new Philippine government to discriminate against those Spaniards?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is another proposition.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is the same proposition.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is only the other side of it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No. I think, when we come to sever our relations, that we ought to protect other countries as much as we can; but, after all, we do it not as a matter of obligation, not as a matter of treaty responsibility, but purely as a matter of comity.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Senator from Nebraska a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose that the Filipino people did not want the Spaniards, or their kind, to live in the country at all, and that the policy of the Philippine government, about to be established, were that all such aliens should leave the country; would our right to liberate them or to allow them to become independent depend upon securing from Spain consent to that policy?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not endeavoring to secure anything from Spain; I am endeavoring, as a condition of the recognition of a new government, to say to that new government, "You must carry out the obligations which we were bound to carry out while we were in the islands."

Mr. CUMMINS. Then, the Senator believes that any new government, the independent government, sought to be established in the Philippine Islands should be bound by all the obligations that the United States has undertaken?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; with relation to that country.

Mr. CUMMINS. With relation to anything?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; not with relation to anything; but with relation to matters under that new government and under that new sovereignty.

Mr. CUMMINS. And that we are not at liberty to surrender our sovereignty there unless the people of the Philippines are willing to undertake those obligations?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think so.

Mr. CUMMINS. That necessarily, of course, involves the further suggestion made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], that if the Philippine government should disregard these obligations, we would be bound to enforce them or be responsible to the government to which they were given.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. As to our responsibility to the other governments I am not undertaking to say. I am, however, undertaking to say that we should not put this power into new hands without requiring them to exercise it as we were bound to exercise it.

Mr. CUMMINS. If that is true, the independence of the Filipino is a dream, and never can be accomplished.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, is the independence of the Filipino a dream if we require him to protect American rights and interests there?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly, it is a dream.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can not see that it is any more a dream when we are required to protect American rights than when we require them to protect Spanish rights, which we have agreed to protect.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suppose we have the right—I am sure we have—to insist upon a certain constitution or plan of government before we surrender our sovereignty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think so.

Mr. CUMMINS. That we have a right to do, or we should maintain our possession of the islands; but when that is done, then the Filipino people stand independent before the world; and if we can not escape the consequence of anything which the Filipino government might thereafter do, I, for one, do not want to see them independent. If we have to be responsible for their conduct, I would rather administer their government.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not seeking to assume responsibility for them; I am seeking to exact a promise from them that they shall, in taking over the government, also take over the promises which we have made.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not disputing the advisability of requiring that; but the reason which the Senator from Nebraska gives for requiring these promises is that we are held to Spain and must answer to Spain for this obligation, and I entirely dissent from the Senator in believing that we have any such obligation toward Spain.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator agrees with my proposition, I, of course, am not particularly disappointed that he criticizes my reasoning; that may not be correctly stated; but certainly some provision of this sort, recognizing the treaty obligations of the United States, should be put into the amendment if it is to be solemnly enacted into law.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I may say there, if the Senator from Nebraska will allow me, that, in my opinion, he has not touched the gravest objection to the amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not yet finished.

Mr. CUMMINS. He is possibly passing the point I have in mind. The United States, in this amendment, does not reserve the right to exercise, nor does it have any opportunity to exercise, any discretion over the plan of government which the Filipino people are expected to establish.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am coming to that. Now, I want to call attention to what there is in the Philippine Islands. Besides our army of 12,000 Americans and 1,000 marines, there are 2,000 Americans in the civilian employ of the government, and a civilian population engaged in business of 8,500. There are 6,500 white Europeans, probably the larger portion of whom are Spaniards, but included in the number are English, Germans, Swedes, Swiss, Danes, Russians, and other nationalities. They all have business interests; they all have investments; many of them have gone in there under the protection of the American flag. Are we to pull out and leave those islands without asking the new government to protect the lives of those people and to guarantee their interests the same as American rights and interests are protected and guaranteed? Yet the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Arkansas would leave that unsaid, would leave the new government entirely capable of discriminating against those people.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Will the Senator permit me to make one observation in that connection?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. With pleasure.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. In delegating authority to a responsible source, it is always the preferable plan to delegate it in very general terms. It is a principle of law that enumeration will weaken in the delegation of authority, because when you go out to deal with subjects outside of the text they must be of the same general class under the doctrine of ejusdem generis. In writing this amendment I kept that principle in view, and provided that—the President is hereby invested with full power and authority to make such orders and regulations and to enter into such negotiations with the authorities of said Philippines.

If the United States stands in the attitude of an indorser of any pledge that has been made to Spain that affects its relations with the Philippine Islands, of course under existing provisions of law the President would have a right to take that into consideration; and, as the Senator from Iowa properly says, in any government that they set up there there must be, or there should be—and there will be—a provision made for respecting in good faith the rights of everybody who would be affected, remotely or otherwise, by the change of sovereignty that takes place. It is not to be assumed that the President is seeking to do anything he should not do, to run away and leave the obligations of the United States unprotected. He is to settle and adjust the matter finally, and upon the high plane on which a great Government like this will deal with all of its obligations; and the assumption is that they will be dealt with justly and honorably. That is so obviously so that every fair-minded man must admit that the settlement will be made on that basis.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am aware that the Senator has drawn his amendment in very general terms; that is what I am criticizing. I say that, according to the precedent in the case of Cuba, this amendment should be so drawn as to specifically include the things that we know the new government of the Philippines should recognize; and it should not specify American rights any more than it should specify other rights guaranteed by the treaty, and for which we are morally responsible.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Would this suggestion meet the views of the Senator, by inserting after the words "United States" the words "and of other countries," so that it would read:

And to cause to be acknowledged, respected, and safeguarded all of the personal and property rights of citizens or corporations of the United States and of other countries resident or engaged in business in said Philippines or having property interests therein.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that would improve the amendment a great deal; but, as the Senator from Arkansas has himself stated, the amendment is somewhat of a patchwork already, and, in my opinion, it should be redrafted.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call attention to the next matter of which I have made a note here, and that is an amendment which the Senator from Arkansas has already indicated he may accept. He provides in his amendment that immediately after the passage of this act the President shall undertake to enter into negotiations with other countries for the neutralization of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I have no objection to that being stricken out.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand. I can not imagine a worse time than the present for the United States to undertake to enter into negotiations with other countries for a joint guaranty of the independence of the Philippine Islands or for anything else. We know that with most of the nations at war it would be absolutely impossible at the present time to initiate, much less secure, such an agreement, and I think that should be left wholly within the discretion of the President of the United States.

Mr. President, I concede that it would be very difficult, even in times of peace, to secure from the nations of the world a guaranty of the neutrality of the Philippine Islands when the matter is left in the condition it will be left in if this amendment is adopted. Guarantee the independence of what? Of a nation that has not come into being? Guarantee the independence of the Philippine Islands when the next Congress or the Congress after or the Congress four years from now may not grant it? Guarantee the independence of the Philippine Islands when the President by his proclamation has power to continue American control for another year? I think that that is a matter which the President should not take up until it has been definitely arranged that the new government is to go into existence and exactly what it is to be. It is going to be hard enough in any event to secure joint action from the great nations of the world to guarantee the independence of the Philippine Islands.

Do Senators think, for instance, that it will be easy to secure a guaranty of the independence of the Philippine Islands from Great Britain—Great Britain that has three or four million Malay subjects within a few hundred miles of the Philippine Islands; Great Britain that is exercising dominion over a number of different races of the world with whom she is having trouble in maintaining her sovereignty at times? I doubt very much whether the British Empire will undertake to guarantee the independence of a Malay republic or any other republic in the Orient, because it will simply add to the agitation among her own people. I might continue the illustration by mentioning other nations. I think the securing of an international guaranty is a very difficult matter, and is certainly not one which should be undertaken at this time when the world is aflame with war.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, does the Senator think that there would be any difficulty in getting Great Britain or any of the other nations to assert, as they did assert in the case of the independence of Hawaii, that they would respect the possessions of the Philippines and would not attempt by the extension of suzerainty or in any other way to exercise jurisdiction or control over them?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. A joint guaranty of that kind involves representatives of those countries meeting together and discussing it; and it is not within the possibilities this year or possibly next year or the year after next to get such representatives together. This is the most inopportune time that could possibly have been selected.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I agree with the Senator that the word "immediately" ought to be stricken out. I do not believe that it is a very opportune time right now; but, at the same time, I believe that we could get an agreement with other nations to respect the territorial possessions of the new Philippine Government.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Colorado, with the permission of the Senator from Nebraska, a question in connection with what has just been said?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What would the Senator from Colorado do in case they made an agreement and did not respect the agreement?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I believe that we would have to rely very largely upon the good faith and honesty of the nations. Sometimes when there is great stress and the motives are strong agreements may be violated; but I do not believe, in the absence of any such condition, that there will be any difficulty. Those conditions do not seem to be applicable to this case; but, in any event, at the end of the five-year period our responsibility would be ended and we could do what we pleased at that time.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator believe, or can he conceive, that it would be possible to involve the United States in war over that proposition?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I think not. Our responsibility now might involve us in war, if it were attempted to do something in contravention of our rights; in fact, I think it unquestionably would; but we are now proposing a lessening of our responsibilities, and it seems to me that we ought to try to bring about the best possible conditions. The difficulty with this situation is this——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator permit me to finish? I have only a little more to say.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well. I merely wanted to amplify my suggestion.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I come to the provision which requires the President to recognize any stable government that may be set up. We required the people of Cuba to do something more than that; we required the people of Cuba to erect a republican form of government.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. And the Cubans were within 100 miles of our own shores, while the Philippine people are 7,000 miles away in a locality where republics are not very fashionable.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is true, Mr. President; but it is also true that this great Nation has spent tens of millions of dollars in the attempt to erect a republican form of government in the Philippine Islands, and I tell you that any party which would take the responsibility of destroying a republican form of government and permitting the creation of an autocracy where the seeds of freedom have once been planted, will be repudiated by the American people. While we are requiring the people of the Philippine Islands to erect a stable government, it is just as easy to say that they shall have a government republican in form. That is the idea that the United States stands for; that is already an idea that will be welcomed by the Philippine people. We should not permit a limited class of the Filipinos to erect a monarchial form of government or an autocracy; we should at the time we are relinquishing our sovereignty over the Philippine Island give to the people of those islands at least the protection of requiring the new government to be republican in form.

Moreover, Mr. President, we should require that this new government should be established by peaceful means. There is nothing in the pending amendment that would prevent the new Philippine governmet from being established by a bloody revolution, so when we are relinquishing our authority in the Philippine Islands, we should lay down also as a condition of recognition that the new government shall be republican in form, and that it shall be established by peaceful means. I think, as I have already said, that the American people will hold any party responsible in this country that fails at least to do that much for the Philippine people when they are turned loose, as the phrase goes, on the great unknown sea of self-government.

Mr. President, I have said this much by way of criticism or analysis of this amendment. I am sorry that it has been introduced. I think that the bill which was presented by the committee had been carefully drawn and carefully digested. I believe it would have received the support not only of the Senators on this side of the Chamber but of a very large number of Senators on the other side of the Chamber. I believe it would have settled the Philippine question, and settled it in a nonpartisan way. I know the Philippine people were satisfied with it. I know that they thought that the first great step toward independence would have been taken by its passage. That bill, if passed, would not only give them their own legislature but the control of almost all of their public officials, the control of taxation, and it would have given them the solemn promise of the Congress of the United States that they were to become an independent nation. It would have been saisfactory; and we could have, with confidence, left to other Congresses the carrying out of the promise made, and, with confidence, we could have left it to the Philippine people that they would work up toward the ideal of self-government in the hope of receiving all the earlier the final act of legislation which would give them their independence. I had hoped that the bill might pass in that form. I believe if it could have remained in that form it would have been passed readily, but this amendment is here, and I present to-day these criticisms of it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not remember that in the course of the colloquy which occurred during my remarks on the pending bill the principal criticisms made by various Senators upon the other side of the Chamber were as to the indefiniteness of the promise, and that Senator after Senator rose and said that there ought to be a more definite promise of independence; that discord would be produced unless the Filipinos were given some such assurance? The preamble, as it existed in the bill, instead of satisfying Senators upon the Republican side of the Chamber, seemed to create a storm of discord over there.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I remember some discussion of that kind.

Mr. President, before I sit down I want to come to the last point of criticism. The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas closes with a direction to the President, or with authority given to the President, to give the guaranty on behalf of the United States alone for the protection of the independence of the Philippine Islands in case the President is not able to secure the cooperation of other countries. Now, Mr. President, I, for one, am not willing at this time to enter into that obligation. The time may come after the establishment of a Philippine government, after we know what they are going to do, when I shall be willing to empower the President of the United States with authority to give that guaranty; but, Mr. President, I think it is altogether too large an obligation for this Government to assume so long in advance. I know that for the United States to guarantee the independence of the Philippine Islands even for five years after the expiration of the four-year period will be as serious an obligation as any we are incurring now in the control of the islands. I know it will cost as much money, and I know it will involve a great many more dangers and complications; and when the proper time comes, if the Senator from Arkansas insists on his amendment in its present form, I shall move to strike out at least that part of the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, I should like some expression of his views as to the propriety of our maintaining a naval base and a coaling station in the Philippines, with the complete independence of the islands.

Suppose that we should give the islands independence, and that they should grant to us a coaling station or naval base, and immediately after obtaining their independence they should proceed to grant the same kind of rights to Japan, or to Great Britain, or to Germany. What would our attitude be, and what authority would we have to exercise over those islands in order to protect our own naval base?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think the Senator raises a very serious question; and it is a question that I, for one, think the present Congress should not undertake to meet. It is not in the original bill. It comes up only as a part of this amendment. There seems to be a general sentiment that when we recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands we should perhaps retain a naval base and a coaling station, or some other property rights or privileges of that sort. That, however, is a question for the future, and in my opinion it is one that this Congress ought not to attempt to settle.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Nebraska whether the hearings developed the value of the island of Batun, which is a small island southeast of Luzon, as a naval base?

I recall that when I was a member of the Committee on the Philippines the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] proposed some measure for the development of that island because of the large measures of coal there. During the discussion it was developed that the island was almost uninhabited; that these coal measures existed; that there was a fairly good harbor upon the island; and that if we should at some time determine to cut loose from the Philippines Batun Island, on account of its lack of complications as to population and its separation from the main islands, would make an excellent naval base and commercial station for the United States, somewhat resembling Hongkong, which, as the Senator will recollect, is an island detached from the mainland of China. Can the Senator give me any information upon that subject?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am not able to do so, because our committee gave very little of its time to the consideration of military or naval questions or policies. We were engaged in the effort to frame a bill that would extend a measure of self-government to the Philippine people, with the promise of ultimate independence. We were expecting to leave to future Congresses the decision of the important question whether the independence of the new government, when recognized, should be guaranteed; and we were not supposed to take into account the values of the various islands for those purposes. I have no doubt the Senator is better informed on that subject than I am.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, for that reason it seems to me it might be well to postpone final action upon this bill until a later day, some time in this session, meanwhile giving the Committee on the Philippine Islands an opportunity of fully investigating the questions that are covered by the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. It is very clear, as the Senator from Nebraska has stated, that this committee confined itself entirely to the question of giving the Filipinos a larger share in their government, and not to the question as to the preparations that might be made for finally cutting loose from those islands.

It now seems to be the opinion of the Senate, from the expressions which I have thus far heard—an opinion in which I share—that we ought now to determine decisively, so far as we can, the relation of those islands to this country. In that view a very important inquiry remains yet to be developed by the Committee on the Philippines, and that is, what preparations are to be made by the United States with a view to shaping gradually the separation of those islands from this country.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, I will conclude in a moment.

My own view was as I expressed it in 1906, after my return from a trip to the Philippine Islands with Mr. Taft and his party, that we should prepare for that separation within a period of 20 years, and that we should address ourselves with the greatest vigor to giving the Filipino people a common language, appropriating money directly from the United States Treasury if necessary in order to accomplish that purpose. It is perfectly evident that out of a total insular revenue of only $11,000,000, or with the municipal revenues added, only $17,000,000, they could not assign to educational purposes more than the $2,000,000 then annually appropriated, and that was sufficient to take care of only one-fourth of the children of the islands.

I also contended during that time that we should teach the Filipino people how to work, and therefore industrial training was essential; and that industrial training necessarily meant not only industrial schools but an agricultural bank that would aid the Filipino farmer to get the improved instruments of production and to use them. At that time they were using the forked stick instead of the plow. I urged that an appropriation should be made, if necessary, by the United States Government for the establishment of such a Filipino bank, with a capital of at least $10,000,000.

I also urged that it was essential that we should untie those islands so far as their tariff relations with the United States were concerned; that if we looked to a thoroughly individualized life for the Philippine Islands that meant an uncomplicated fiscal and tariff system of their own eventually, and that we should not by a favored tariff system, giving their products favor in our markets and our products favor in theirs, create a condition of mutual subsidy which it would be hard to undo, and which if undone abruptly at some future time would involve those islands in industrial and commercial complications that would bring about depression in business, unemployment, and want, and as a necessary result revolution itself, which would entirely undo the good work which we had accomplished.

All these things, it seems to me, ought to be looked after in any rational preparation for parting with those islands. Whilst I am in favor of parting with them as soon as possible, I want to part with them as creditably as possible. It seems to me that the Senate could well defer its final action upon all the amendments to this bill for a period of a month or six weeks or two months, fixing a certain day for their consideration, and that meanwhile the Committee on the Philippine Islands could address itself to these questions which it has not thus far considered, and present to us a complete scheme of gradual withdrawal from the islands.

If the suggestion which I then made had been carried out, they would have been much better prepared for separation than they are now, for my suggestion involved securing to the Philippines a thoroughly individualized life, with their own fiscal and tariff system entirely uncomplicated with our own, the only connecting link between the islands and our own being the commission itself, which constituted the higher legislative body of those islands. Later on, if a native legislative body were substituted for this, they would be prepared to carry on an individualized life after a president or an executive of that republic were selected in the place of the Governor General whom we have there.

These complications exist. We do not know what naval bases we want, if any. We do not know what commercial stations we want, if any. We hardly know to-day what our tariff relations are with those islands. We do not know to-day what our complications are as to trade. We hardly know to-day what our complications are with those islands as to our navigation laws. We have undoubtedly, both in Cuba and in the Philippine Islands, built up favored conditions of trade for this country under which we have ousted the trade of other countries hitherto enjoying trade with those islands and substituted our own; and we are now about to give the Philippine Islands a separate existence.

This question of complicated trade relations is a very important one. I do not wish to see this country enter upon the decision of a great economic question without preparation. We have been accustomed to play with economic questions in the gayest of ways, unmindful of the disruptions in business, in trading conditions, of unemployment and want, created by our action. I should like to see the great American Nation finish this great job, this altruistic job, that it has started out to perform, with a proper regard not simply for vague principles of liberty and independence but with a proper regard for the substantial economic welfare of the Filipino people.

Mr. President, with the permission of the Senate, I should like to insert in the RECORD the whole or portions of two magazine articles, one in the North American Review and the other in the Independent, written in the years 1905 and 1906, respectively, after my return from the Philippines, and at a time when I was a member, I think, of the Philippine Committee, and when these questions of tariff adjustments were under consideration. These articles contain much that is applicable at the present time regarding the policy of gradual separation from the Philippines, although the forecast regarding possible importations of sugar from the islands has not been fully realized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? If not, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

A DEMOCRAT IN THE PHILIPPINES.

[Article from the North American Review of December, 1905, by Francis G. Newlands, United States Senator from Nevada.]

When Secretary Taft invited me to accompany him on his trip to the Philippines I hesitated. I had been opposed from the start to the acquisition of the islands. On the day following Dewey's victory I had personally urged President McKinley to order his fleet to Cuba, insisting that the purpose of the war was not to conquer the Philippines, but to free Cuba, upon whose soil we had not yet landed a soldier. After Spain passed her scant title to us, I had urged that we should hold the islands in trust for the Filipino people, that we should make an immediate declaration of our purpose to grant them independence, and that we should take steps to quickly accomplish this purpose.

I had no illusions regarding the Filipino people. I did not believe them fitted for democratic methods of government, nor that they could quickly develop into a homogeneous people, or act with unity of purpose. I thought it probable that, if we left them to themselves, there would be civil war and continued disorder until some foreign power should intervene, or one race should gain the mastery over the others, or the leadership of some masterful man should result in military dictatorship.

While these consequences might be deplorable, I did not deem it our duty to attempt to avert them by subjugating the numerous races of the archipelago. If the Filipino people were to be killed, it were better that they should kill each other than that we should kill them; or if they were to be conquered by a foreign power, that some other country should undertake the destructive task. Besides, I believe that the proper evolution of the Filipino people was not be accomplished through subjection to an alien people, but through the slow process of self-development by which nations have risen to strength and power.

I was concerned more for our own people and institutions than for the Filipino people or their institutions. I felt that a great nation, established for the first time in the history of the world upon the basic principle that just government rests upon the consent of the governed, and that taxation and representation are inseparable, should not qualify ideals which had advanced democratic institutions everywhere. I felt that our institutions were endangered by an intense commercialism, which had lowered the standards of municipal, State, and national life, and that our concern should be to save democracy at home rather than to promote imperialism abroad.

Such were my views regarding the Philippines, but the country had in two campaigns decided that the Philippines should be retained. While my views had not changed, I felt the futility of further contention, and feared that a trip to the Philippines would simply be a waste of time.

But I also recognized the fact that the two parties, as represented by their leaders, Roosevelt and Bryan, did not stand far apart. Bryan from the start had insisted that there should be an immediate declaration of our purpose to grant independence to the Filipinos. Roosevelt, in a recent message, had declared that it was his firm belief that the United States could help the Filipinos to rise higher and higher in the scale of civilization and capacity for self-government, and that it was his earnest hope that in the end they would be able to stand, if not entirely alone, yet in some such relation to the United States as that in which Cuba now stands.

It was clear, therefore, that the best men of both parties were now intent upon solving the question in a manner consistent with the theory and the traditions of our Government.

The most potent factor in this dispassionate view of the question had been Judge Taft, whose fixed determination to conduct the government of the Philippines in the interest of the Filipino people as a sacred trust, uncontrolled by selfish considerations, had aroused the moral sentiment and challenged the admiration of the country. I felt that the invitation of such a man to members of the opposite party to accompany him upon his proposed trip of inspection, affording, as it did, opportunity for nonpartisan consideration of the Philippine question, was not to be lightly regarded, and I concluded to accept the invitation.

THE FILIPINO PEOPLE.

At almost every city and town we visited we were entertained by processions representing the army, the native scouts and constabulary, the various industries and the schools, as well as by banquets in which leading Filipinos participated. We also had hearings of those interested in the various agricultural and business pursuits and those who had suggestions and complaints to make regarding existing political conditions. From my observations and inquiry, I should say that the Filipinos are an interesting people and capable of much development. The children learn English with great facility and there seems to be a general desire among all classes for education, the night schools being crowded by those who are occupied during the day. The total population is about 7,000,000. The number of children of school age (7 to 15) is over 2,000,000, of whom only about one-sixth are enrolled. I was told that there was much eagerness to attend the schools, but that insufficiency of funds prevented the increase of the enrollment.

We listened to the Filipino leaders at banquets and public meetings. They had, as a rule, pleasing voices, of a vibrant tone that appealed to the emotions, and I have no doubt that they would be very potent in influencing the masses of their people. They carried themselves with dignity and self-control. They showed much familiarity with our struggle for independence, and spoke persuasively, earnestly, and eloquently regarding the aspirations of their people for independence. But it was not apparent that they had much conception of the individual rights and the fundamental liberties which independence should secure. It is impossible that they could have. The educated class constitutes a very small percentage of the population. Most of them had been trained under the Spanish government of dishonesty and graft, in which almost every official was the oppressor, certainly not the servant, of the people, and under which the peasants, constituting about 90 per cent of the population, were exploited by the official and influential classes, both Spanish and Filipinos. These peasants are said to be patient, submissive, easily influenced and easily led. Under the influence of their leaders, the patient agricultural peasants of to-day become the ladrones or the fanatical pulijanes or the patriotic insurrectos, or all combined, of to-morrow. They have been accustomed to the orinetal system, represented by rulers such as sultans, datos and caciques, headmen who direct the energies of their people, and to whose will the peasant class is subject.

That the peasants also desire independence can not be doubted. They would prefer to be led and governed by their own leaders, even though the latter have in view their industrial subjection. I am satisfied, from what I have seen and heard in the Philippines, that there can be no permanent friendliness between the Filipinos and the Americans. The Filipino people, as a rule, wish a national life, even though most of them have no real conception of what liberty means.

The islands were not quiet. A long and expensive campaign had been waged in Cavite against the ladrones, necessitating martial law and the reconcentration of the natives, who were disposed to shelter and protect them.

Samar had been in confusion as the result of the outbreak of the pulijanes or "red breeches," the mountain people of that island, in an insurrectionary movement, half religious and fanatical and half protest against the native officials, who, though elected under American administration, thought their offices justified Spanish and Oriental extortion and oppression. All these movements taxed to the full the strength of the scouts and the constabulary forces.

PRESENT CONDITIONS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

In contrast with the beautiful appearance of the islands was the doleful story of the people. Added to the ravages of the civil war with Spain, and of our war of conquest, were the disasters caused by cholera, rinderpest, surra, the locusts, and typhoons. The agricultural depression was great. The sugar plantations were without modern machinery and modern methods, and it was impossible to borrow money for their renovation. And yet, notwithstanding these untoward conditions, the apparent contradiction of an increase in wages also existed and it was difficult to get laborers for agricultural industries. This was accounted for by the statement that the movements of the military forces and the public works had withdrawn the laborers from the farms. Indisposition to work was also complained of. The increase in wages enabled the natives to secure by one day's labor what used to require two. The result was that the laborer, having earned in one or two days enough to secure a week's supply of rice, would lie off until the pressure of hunger again drove him to work.

THE INSULAR COMMISSION.

The Philippine Commission is conscientiously working out the problems of good government, with a single eye to the prosperity and advancement of the Filipino people. It is not yet a government of the people or by the people, but it is preeminently a government for the people, and its purpose is to instruct the people, and particularly the peasant class, so as to give them a realization of what justice, individual rights, and civil responsibility mean.

Believing that a common language and the creation of a public opinion are essential to self-government, the Commission has prepared to make the universal language English. English is taught first by American teachers and later on by Filipino teachers, who have been instructed by them. The educational expenditure, insular, provincial, and municipal, is about $2,000,000 gold annually. At least $6,000,000 is required.

This educational system, of course, involves the danger that the educated child is likely to drift from manual labor, but the commission is wisely directing it in industrial channels by promoting agricultural and manual-training schools.

In addition to the requirements of education, money is also required for road building, for railroads, for harbor and municipal improvements, and for the development of the agricultural interests. The municipal and harbor improvements and road building have been covered by bond issues authorized at the last session, with interest, if I am right, at 5 per cent.

Congress recently authorized the construction of about 1,000 miles of railroad in the various islands by private corporations, involving a cost of about $30,000,000, and the issue by them of bonds for such construction, with interest at 4 per cent, the interest to be guaranteed by the insular government. As the amount of the bonds will doubtless build the railroads, I urged in the Senate that we should authorize the insular government to build the railroads and to issue bonds therefor to the extent of $30,000,000 at 2 per cent, with the guaranty of the United States as to both principal and interest. While not prepared to urge Government ownership at home, owing to the complexity of our Government and the difficulty of insuring businesslike methods of administration, I felt that Government ownership suited the necessarily paternal nature of the insular government and was merely in line with the policy now adopted as the result of experience with both State-aided and State-owned railroads in the British and Dutch East Indies and that the commission was a body of such capacity, integrity, experience, and administrative qualifications that it could easily undertake the work. The saving between 2 per cent, the rate of bonds so guaranteed by the United States, and the income which a private corporation would expect, would pay for the roads in 30 years, and a light cost of transportation would greatly lighten the burdens of the islands. I regret to say that the movement failed.

AGRICULTURAL BANK.

There is strong need of an agricultural bank, resembling those of Germany and Egypt, with a capital of at least $10,000,000. It is impossible to expect such a bank to be organized by private capital when the condition is such as is described by the Manila Chamber of Commerce in these words:

"The country, generally speaking, is in a state of financial collapse. The agriculturists and merchants are passing through the worst crisis ever known in the annals of Filipino history. A series of calamities have contributed to bring the country to this deplorable state."

An agricultural bank could loan the money necessary to introduce improved methods, particularly on the sugar plantations. It could also aid in the development of the 400,000 acres of land purchased from the friars, which are still on the hands of the insular government. Assisted by the bureau of agriculture, it could accomplish the development of the general agricultural interests of the islands upon a thoroughly modern and scientific basis. All moneys advanced could be properly secured upon the improvements made, and thus an insular agricultural bank, with a capital derived from the sale of insular bonds at 2 per cent, guaranteed by the United States, could do a business that would earn at least 6 per cent.

It will be economy for the United States to move generously and efficiently now. Economic distress may result in discontent that will cause outbreaks whose suppression will cost infinitely more than the aid at present needed. It must be remembered that the tropical islands have been languishing for years. The Temperate Zone has beaten the Tropical Zone in competition in sugar and tobacco. The outbreak of Cuba against Spain was largely due to economic distress caused by the low price of sugar. I think it likely that it has also had something to do with the contemporaneous discontent in the Philippines.

The insular revenues are now only about $9,000,000 in gold, to which may be added $3,000,000 in gold as the municipal revenues for Manila and $2,000,000 in gold as the provincial and municipal revenues outside of Manila. Fourteen million dollars in gold is the sum that is now available annually for all purposes—insular, provincial, and municipal—in a government of 7,000,000 people. When we recall that the District of Columbia, with less than 300,000 people, requires about $9,000,000 or $10,000,000 annually for municipal and District purposes, it seems amazing that the Insular Commission should have accomplished so much with so little.

ABOLITION OF TARIFF DUTIES.

The main measure of relief for the Philippine Islands thus far urged is the abolition of American duties on Philippine products, to be followed, when the Spanish treaty expires three years hence, by the abolition of Philippine duties upon American products. Such a proposition involves the closed door in the Philippines at a time when we are strenuously urging the open door in China, Manchuria, and Korea. This is both wrong and impolitic; wrong because consistency is required of nations as well as individuals, and impolitic because it will give Japan and China an excuse for securing favored arrangements in the Orient which will exclude our products. If we get the monopoly of imports into the Philippines, it would not compensate for the losses which we would sustain in the rest of the Orient by the assertion of this policy. If we refuse equal opportunities for Japanese trade in the Philippines, how can we insist upon equal opportunities with Japan in Manchuria and Korea?

I am aware that this suggestion of free trade, or freer trade, appeals to many Democrats; but reflection, I think, should convince anyone that the arrangement, so far as the Philippine Islands are concerned, means restricted trade, not freer trade. At present the Philippine Islands have a tariff which conforms to the theory of a tariff for revenue only, so strenuously urged by many Democrats, for it imposes a duty of only 20 per cent upon importations from all countries, including the United States, without preference to any. It is now proposed that this tariff should be maintained as to all other countries, but be abolished as to the United States, the very purpose being to give the United States the monopoly of imports into the Philippines and to exclude the products of England, France, Germany, Spain, and other countries. Can this restricted trade be called free trade or freer trade? At best the proposed arrangement will be one of subsidy.

SUGAR SUBSIDY.

The tendency of our policy in the Tropics has been to destroy the revenue feature of the sugar tax by giving the tax as an additional price to the producers of sugar in the tropical islands. The world's price of raw sugar is about 2 cents per pound, or $40 per ton; the price in America is $75 per ton, because the customs duty of 1¾ cents per pound, or $35 per ton, is added. When, therefore, sugar is imported from the tropical islands duty free, it sells in our markets at the same price as the duty-paid sugar—$75 per ton—and thus the tropical planter gets on the duty-free sugar, as a subsidy, the amount of the duty which the Treasury loses. Porto Rico, Cuba, and Hawaii send all their sugar to the United States, because the sugar of Porto Rico and Hawaii comes in duty free, and the Cuban sugar comes in with one-fourth of the duty, or about $9 per ton, off. On their production the planters in these islands get in the United States markets the following amounts annually more than they can get anywhere else, and this constitutes the annual subsidy of these tropical islands:

Hawaii, 400,000 tons, duty free, $35 per ton	$14,000,000
Porto Rico, 100,000 tons, duty free, $35 per ton	3,500,000
Cuba, 1,000,000 tons, one-fourth duty off, $9 per ton	9,000,000
Total subsidy	26,500,000

The imports from Cuba are increasing, and it is claimed that during the coming season they will be 1,300,000 tons.

Under similar circumstances there is no reason why the Filipino planters should not restore their old maximum of 400,000 tons annually, on which a similar subsidy of $35 per ton would amount to $14,000,000 per annum above what they could receive in Hongkong or in any other sugar market except the United States.

If, as has been done in Cuba, under the influence of a smaller subsidy, the increase should be to 1,000,000 tons annually, the total subsidy of the Filipino planters would amount to $35,000,000 annually, and the United States Treasury would suffer loss in that amount. In time, therefore, the sugar tax would lose its character as a revenue producer and would be turned into a subsidy for tropical islands.

POLITICAL COMPLICATIONS.

Important political difficulties are also likely to arise from complicating our revenue system with that of the Philippine Islands. The Philippine Islands are now almost entirely dependent upon customs duties for their revenue. If this plan of mutual subsidy goes through and the United States secures the monopoly of the Philippine markets, it necessarily follows that little or no revenue will come from the customs and that the Philippine Government will be compelled to substitute land and other internal taxes. Already it has taken measures to institute the land tax, and the protest is so loud and deep as to compel the postponement of its operation.

Again, I understand our purpose is to train the Filipino people in self-government, in the hope that ultimately they will be fitted for independence. If this be really our purpose, it would be very unwise to complicate the fiscal and revenue systems of the two countries; for, when separation comes, industrial disturbance may follow the change in these fiscal and revenue relations. Our policy should be to hold the Philippines as an entity absolutely separate from the United States, the only connection between them being the civil government, which should gradually draw the Filipinos into participation until the time is ripe for independence. Then the United States can at any time declare its trust ended and turn over the government of the Philippines to its ward. It is an essential doctrine of equity that the trustee should not mingle his ward's property or interests with his own, and our government in the Philippines should be so administered as to enable our ward, when she comes to the maturity of her powers, to move among the nations in a thoroughly uncomplicated and individualized life. Would it not be uncandid, whilst professing a desire to fit the Filipino people for self-government and independence, to bind the two countries together, at the same time, so strongly by navigation laws and tariff legislation and commercial ties generally as to make it impossible to cut the political ties without a serious and perhaps fatal readjustment? If American capital secures the monopoly of ocean transportation between the islands and the United States, of interisland navigation, and of railroad transportation, and also the control of subsidized sugar planting, every selfish and commercial consideration will stand in the way of a moral settlement of this important question.

SUGGESTED LEGISLATION.

I would suggest, therefore, in place of the proposed reduction in duties the following legislation:

(1) The repeal of the act extending our coast navigation laws to the Philippine Islands. These will confessedly impose a higher burden on the transportation of her exports and imports than now. Their operation has already been postponed for a time by a recent act.

(2) If not too late, the repeal of the act authorizing insular aid for railroad building by the insular guaranty of 4 per cent interest on the $30,000,000 of bonds, and the substitution of insular construction and ownership of the proposed railroads accomplished by means of an insular bond issue at 2 per cent guaranteed by the United States.

(3) The authorization of insular, provincial, and municipal bonds sufficient to cover needed permanent improvements, the bonds bearing interest at 2 per cent, thus facilitating the application of a larger portion of current revenues to education, particularly of an industrial character. The enrollment of the schools should be trebled.

(4) An issue of $10,000,000 of bonds for an insular agricultural bank, the bonds to bear interest at 2 per cent and to be guaranteed by the United States; such bank to aid the introduction of machinery and improved methods in agriculture by secured loans to the farmers.

All these bonds should run for 30 years, in which time the saving in interest should pay for them. The total, including railroads, would be about $600,000,000, or, without railroads, $30,000,000.

SEPARATION.

When the time comes for final determination of the relations of the Filipinos to us, a plebiscite can be taken. If separation is then desired by either, it can be accomplished. Meanwhile, the United States can largely center its own expenditures at Subig Bay, which, cut off by the mountains from the rest of Luzon, and having but few native occupants, can be made an easily defended naval, coaling, and commercial station for our Navy and merchant marine. When the time comes for separation, we can easily retain Subig Bay and thus make it a link in the chain of our naval and commercial administration.

If the bonds authorized by us are not by that time retired, and if the islanders can not bear the burden of debt contracted by our authority, we can pay it and cancel the obligation, thus adding a timely generosity to the hundreds of millions now irreclaimably lost in the military and naval expenses connected with our control of the Philippines.

This will be more businesslike, wiser, and cheaper than the proposed tariff subsidy, which within 40 years would probably turn over to the Filipino planters from $300,000,000 to $600,000,000 in sugar subsidies paid by the American consumers in an unjust tax diverted from the United States Treasury. The islands will then be on a healthy and uncomplicated basis, instead of on a stimulated and complicated basis which will make the nursing bottle of subsidy essential to their existence.

I have not the space to enter into the consideration of the strategic mistake of having possessions occupied by unwilling subjects so far removed from our base—impossible of defense should the time come in the Orient when we may be beset by foes outside the islands and by insurrectos within, or of the great military expense entailed by holding them as an asset instead of a trust.

The fact is that, prior to the war, if Spain had offered them to us, we would have refused. Dewey's victory happened to be in Manila Bay instead of in the open sea. Shall we, therefore, permit ourselves to remain always under the tyranny of an accident?

But far above these practical considerations are the moral considerations for which Roosevelt, Bryan, and Taft stand as representatives of true democracy, which has not yet lost faith in government of the people, for the people, and by the people. We can not check the aspiration for independence in the Philippines when such advocates of political morality in both parties voice it in the United States. Separation will some day come. Let us intelligently prepare for it.

THE RIGHT WAY TO HELP THE FILIPINOS.

[An article from the Independent of Mar. 8, 1906, by FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS.]

(Senator NEWLANDS, of Nevada, was a member of the Taft party, which visited Japan and the Philippines last summer, and on this account as well as because of his special study of Philippine affairs, he is an authority in Congress and the country on the islands.—Editor.)

It is easy enough to theorize and criticize, but before we can practically and impartially discuss the Philippine situation and develop the right way to help the Filipinos, two primal questions must be answered without partisan prejudice, to wit, What do we want of the Philippines? and, What do the Filipinos want?

In one word, the Filipinos want independence. This is true of the Filipinos almost without exception, from the highest to the lowest, from the richest to the poorest, from the most intelligent to the most ignorant.

What we want of the Philippines is harder to answer, because, in the past, at least, according to our conditions, we have wanted various conflicting things; but a process of elimination has been going on as our eyes have been opened by time and experience.

Some were controlled by commercial sentiment. They wanted to make money out of the Philippines, but they are now realizing that no money is to be made. This is the class that is now clamorous for Chinese labor and for an American tariff subsidy to Filipino production, to be guided and controlled by American exploiters.

The convictions of some have been guided by religious sentiment, but they have discovered that the Filipinos are already at least a nominally Christian people, under the guidance of the Roman Catholic Church.

Some have been controlled by military spirit. Conquest and expansion has been their cry. Now they realize that there is no glory in conquering the Philippines, and that the military expense connected with the retention of the islands has been and will continue to be enormous.

Some claimed that we had acquired a commercial base in the Orient and that the Philippines would be a connecting link in our trade with China and Japan. They now realize that this trade, via the Philippines, must take two sides of a triangle instead of one, and that the idea of making the Philippines a base of trade with China and Japan is as absurd as for England to make Jamaica the base of her trade with the United States.

But the controlling factor in our sentiment toward the islands has undoubtedly been that the Filipinos were unable to take care of the Philippines, and that we owed a duty both to the people there and to civilization which compelled us, for a time at least, to exercise sovereignty. This conviction is not lost, but the prevailing feeling of the American people corresponds with the prevailing feeling of the Taft party—regret that we are there and longing to get out creditably. We have no wish to hold them as a subject dependency. We have no desire to exploit them. On the contrary, we all—or almost all—honestly wish to train and educate them as speedily as possible in a common language and the principles of self-government for either qualified or absolute independence.

The Filipinos desire independence and the Americans wish them to have it. The only difference between us, or among ourselves, is as to time. When the treaty with Spain was ratified, two resolutions were introduced in the Senate to this end. The Bacon resolution had the support of most of the Democrats and a few of the Republicans. The McEnery resolution had the support of most of the Republicans and a few Democrats. The two resolutions agreed in this: That the Philippines were not to be held as an integral part of the country. The difference was that the Bacon resolution was for speedy withdrawal and recognition of independence, while the McEnery resolution declared for their future disposal according to the best interests of the people of the United States and the people of the Philippine Islands. It was therefore a unanimous declaration of the Senate that the islands were not to be held as an integral part of the United States.

TARIFF SUBSIDY.

The danger of the course which we are at present attempting is that it will surely result in making them an integral part of this country by legislation, instead of holding them as a separate political body, having all the attributes of autonomy except the Central Government, which we have created—the Philippine Commission. It is proposed to extend our coast navigation laws to them, so as to give our shipowners the monopoly of their business, and to withdraw the tariff barriers between the two countries in such a way as to practically destroy their tariff system and to seriously affect our own by complicating the tariff policy of both countries. The fiscal and tariff interests of the two countries will be so interwoven as to prevent us from cutting the Philippines loose from connection with this country when it becomes desirable to do so.

The alleged purpose of this legislation regarding the tariff is to give Philippine products unrestricted access to our markets, where the price of sugar and tobacco, and some other products, is raised high above the international level by our protective tariff. But it means much more to us than simply extending to the Filipino producer the same high rates which protection affords our own producers. It means more to the country, more to every American.

The result of this legislation, so far as sugar is concerned, is to double the price which the Filipino could obtain anywhere outside of America. It will undoubtedly encourage him in the production of sugar, but the price will be paid by the American consumer, who is compelled to stand the burden of nearly $100,000,000 annually on sugar, under a tariff the purpose of which was to encourage home production and raise a large revenue from the foreign product. It will render abortive the very purpose of the tariff, and will accustom the Filipino to a price for his sugar which is double what he can get from the rest of the world, thus preventing any political action in the future which would sever the two countries. So, also, the extension of our navigation laws will build up a great shipping interest, whose profits will depend upon the monopoly of Philippine transportation. This interest will also seek to block any legislation in the future looking to the disposition of the islands.

If our purpose is, as we have declared, to fit the Filipinos for self-government and to give them their independence, shall we not defeat our purpose by building up powerful interests which, in the very nature of things, must block such legislation? If we pursue this system of subsidy to the Filipino, shall we really benefit him in the end? Will not the withdrawal of it, in case we finally conclude to follow our original purpose and give the Filipinos the independence which they want and we want them to have, plunge them into a condition of suffering and distress such as they have never realized?

SELF-SUSTAINING METHODS.

The real difficulty with the Philippines is that the people do not know how to work to advantage and how to produce in large and profitable quantities. The islands are agricultural, and never will be anything else, but the methods of production are primitive beyond description—a forked stick for a plow, the soil stirred to a depth of 3 inches, a buffalo for the motive power of the sugar mill, and hand labor everywhere instead of machinery. Subsidizing the products with fictitious prices is one way to stimulate them, but artificial aid can not be suspended without unnecessary suffering.

The right way to help the Filipinos is to train them in self-sustaining methods. The declared purpose of this whole movement in the Philippines is philanthropic. Philanthropy always costs the philanthropist something, and whatever form our philanthropy takes, we must be prepared for certain expense; but this proposed scheme of philanthropy, through subsidized inflation of prices to be obtained in America, not only threatens grave danger in the future; it also creates dishonest bookkeeping. It can easily be shown that through this system the islands will cost America, in subsidies alone, in the next 20 years, from $300,000,000 to $500,000,000, which our accounts with the Philippines will not show a penny of.

A much wiser way is that the aid should take two forms—one for education, one for improved methods in agriculture.

In the Philippines there are 2,000,000 children of school age. Only 500,000 are now at school. If we wish to train them in a common language as a means to self-government, it should be done at once. Delay will only add to the cost. The school system is established. The $2,000,000 per annum which the Filipino Government, out of its scanty revenue, applies to this purpose, is insufficient. It will require much more, particularly if the needed agricultural and manual training schools are started. If we are bent upon real philanthropy we should appropriate the additional amount necessary and let the books show the loss.

Improved methods of agriculture should be accomplished not by direct appropriation but by the organization of an agricultural bank, such as has proved so advantageous to the Egyptian peasants. This Government should furnish the capital. Private enterprise can not be relied upon for this kind of banking. The only banks in the Orient are commercial corporations, mainly engaged in exchange, not in loaning money. They make large profits out of the inequalities in the value of money in the various countries, and have nothing to loan upon farming securities. It is the farmer, in the Philippines, who must receive aid. Direct and artificial aid will simply demoralize him or encourage foreigners to crowd him off the soil as long as it lasts. Loans by an agricultural bank, secured by the land he must improve and by the modern machinery required for its best development, would tend to promote both independence and self-respect. A Government bank could be so conducted as to effect the agricultural regeneration of the Philippine Islands, if the islands are worth anything at all—if they are worth regenerating. If they are not worth anything, the sooner we find it out the better—and we shall find it out quicker and at less cost in this way than in any other.

If we should properly develop the field of action of an agricultural bank, taxable property would be created in the Philippines that would relieve us of the expense of education, and enabling the islands to assume the burden without knowing it.

A SEPARATE AUTONOMY.

Thus the desired end would be accomplished, with the maintenance in the Philippines of an absolutely separate autonomy, at a cost which is nothing compared with the three to five hundred millions which we shall actually pay, if the subsidy system is followed for the same length of time, and with the infinitely better result that, instead of being tangled in tariff and navigation complications impossible to sever without causing untold distress, the islands will be self-sustaining, self-supporting, self-governing, only connected to this country by the appointed Philippine Commission, acting as the higher house—the Governor General as chief executive.

By this means we shall have established, in 20 years, a complete, autonomized government in the Philippine Islands; a government absolutely uncomplicated with our own; with its own fiscal system, its own revenue system and all the attributes—judicial, legislative, and executive—that are essential to national life. Then, when the time comes to cut the knot, it will be a safe and easy matter, after reserving a naval and coaling station, to permit the Filipino to cast off and sail away into the ocean of independence.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 27, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal and ever-living God, in whom all our longings, hopes, and aspirations are centered, we thank Thee for the phenomenal growth of our past, for the auspicious present, for the hopes and ever-widening promises of our future as a people. Impress, we beseech Thee, every American citizen with the responsibility resting upon him as such, and illumine the minds of these their servants that they may be guided by Thy counsels, that in the present crisis of the world everything may be put to the crucial test of reason and justice. If it is wisdom to prepare for the worst, let it be adequately and efficiently done; but let us hope and pray for the best, that we may not be called upon to defend our sacred rights by the destructive agencies of war, but rather by the rational and peaceful methods of arbitration. And Thine be the praise forever and ever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LIFE AND PUBLIC SERVICES OF WILLIAM M'KINLEY.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, next Saturday, the 29th, is generally recognized as "McKinley Day" inasmuch as that was the day on which he was born, and I desire to ask unanimous consent to address the House for 40 minutes on the life, character, and public services of William McKinley, to follow immediately Mr. HENRY, of Texas, who I believe has the consent of the House to speak on that day immediately following the approval of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] asks unanimous consent to be permitted to address the House for 40 minutes on next Saturday at the close of the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], said remarks to be commemorative of former President McKinley. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXPOSITION AT PENSACOLA, FLA.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Legislature of Florida with respect to the holding of an exposition in the city of Pensacola to celebrate the cession of Florida by Spain to the United States, said exposition to be held in the year 1919, and at a later day I will address the House on the subject of asking Congress to assist us.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. WILSON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a resolution of the Legislature of Florida looking toward an exposition to celebrate the cession of Florida to the United States. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Florida, is it the purpose of this movement to make this exposition national in its scope?

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Well, at this time it is in its incipiency, and we hope the Congress will assist us.

Mr. BARNHART. If it were purely a local matter with which only the State has to do, I should be disposed to object, but if it is to be national in its scope, as other expositions have been, I would have no objection.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. We intend, as I stated, to ask Congress to help us to make the matter more than of local interest, because I think it should be.

Mr. BARNHART. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

THE EUROPEAN WAR AND INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech delivered by Hon. Joseph E. Davies, chairman of the Federal Trades Commission, before the American Manufacturers' Export Association, in New York City, on the European war and industrial democracy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in th RECORD by printing a speech delivered by Hon. Joseph E. Davies, of New York, on the European war. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia if the author of this speech holds any official position?

Mr. HOWARD. He is chairman of the Federal Trades Commission, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. That is the new commission.

Mr. HOWARD. And the speech, I will state to the gentleman from Indiana, is one containing information gathered by this officer, which, I believe, will be of much value not only to Congress but to the country in general.

Mr. BARNHART. Does the Federal Trades Commission make an official report to Congress?

Mr. HOWARD. I think it does, but I do not know.

Mr. MANN. Once a year.

Mr. HOWARD. It is a very recent organization, as the gentleman knows. I do not know what they have done or what they propose to do, but this is a speech worthy of the consideration——

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. HOWARD (continuing). Of all statesmen like the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Will not object because the Federal Trades Commission, whatever they may do, are trying to do something.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, as far as "the gentleman from Indiana" is concerned, he is not disposed to object to anything that will contribute information to the public by a public official in relation to what his department may be doing; but in these instances, where these commissions and other departments have the facilities and money appropriated to make reports from time to time, I would doubt the propriety of permitting the promiscuous admission of their statements to the RECORD. So far as I am concerned, however, in this instance, I think I will not object.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, as I tried to present my importunity to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART], I desire now, as he yielded on my rising, to thank him for his amiability.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CHARLES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have my remarks on the child-labor bill inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. There is general leave to print on the child-labor bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the request.

Mr. CHARLES. I want to ask unanimous consent to have my remarks on the child-labor bill printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Everybody has leave to print for five legislative days.

Mr. CARTER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have my remarks inserted in the RECORD on the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Gen. Banks, of Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CARTER] asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the life and character of the late Gen. Banks, of Massachusetts. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LATE REPRESENTATIVE ALFRED MILNES.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to address the House briefly on the life and character of Alfred Milnes, a former Member of this House during the Fifty-fourth Congress, who has recently passed away.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to address the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, it is with profound sorrow that I rise to speak upon the life and character of a former Member of this House during the Fifty-fourth session, who at that time represented the district which I now have the honor to represent in the State of Michigan.

The Hon. Alfred Milnes was one of the prominent citizens of that great State. His life and character were interwoven with the best traditions and the civic progress of that great Commonwealth. He passed away on the 15th day of January, 1916, after a somewhat protracted illness, at his home in the city of Coldwater, which is a thriving city in my district. In the Biographical Congressional Record it is stated of him:

Milnes, Alfred, a Representative from Michigan; born in Bradford, Yorkshire, England, May 28, 1844; came with his parents to the United States in 1854, and settled in Newton, Iowa; moved to Coldwater, Mich.; attended the common schools of Utah, Iowa, and of Coldwater, Mich.; enlisted as a private in the Seventeenth Michigan Infantry, the "Old Stonewall Regiment," June 30, 1862, and served throughout the war; engaged with his regiment in every battle in which it took part, from South Mountain, Md., in 1862, to Lee's surrender at Appomattox in April, 1865; city alderman of Coldwater one term and mayor two terms; member of the State senate 1888–1890; lieutenant governor of Michigan in 1894, and presided over the State senate until his resignation, June 1, 1895; elected as a Republican to the Fifty-fourth Congress, to fill vacancy caused by the resignation of Julius C. Burrows, and served from December 2, 1895, to March 3, 1897; appointed postmaster of Coldwater in 1898; delegate in the Michigan constitutional convention 1907–1908; member of board of managers Michigan Soldiers' Home; a resident of Coldwater, Mich.

Much might be added to this modest sketch of his life, which probably received his approval for use in the directory, if it was not wholly written by himself. The life of Mr. Milnes was blended with the civic and business activities not only of his home city of Coldwater but of the State of Michigan. It was my pleasure, and I might say good fortune, to make his acquaintance during the convention which nominated him for Congress in 1895. I was a candidate for the same office, but was defeated by one vote on the two hundred and seventy-fourth ballot. Since that time and always thereafter we were the best of friends, and I am sincerely sorrowful because of his departure.

It must be said of Mr. Milnes that he was a firm and resolute man; a man of strong activities and of strong convictions. He was prosperous in his business undertakings and always took a prominent part in public affairs. He held many positions of public trust, in all of which he gave his best efforts and filled them with much credit to himself and with ability and honor to the position. We knew him as the soldier-statesman. Courageous and strong, he was a good debater and an opponent worthy of one's best efforts. It was my privilege to serve with him in the convention of 1908 which drafted the new constitution for the State of Michigan, which was so strongly approved and ratified by the people and now so favorably considered by them. Many of its best provisions bear the impress of his efforts and are tempered with his strong mentality. I think it can be said of him that he never shrunk from a duty or turned lightly from a task.

He was always proud of having served his country in the great rebellion that preserved its Union. During his services in this House in the Fifty-fourth Congress he voted for the bankruptcy act. He also voted for the immigration bill containing a literacy test. He also voted for the recognition of Cuban belligerency on the 2d of March, 1896. He served as a Republican member upon the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River and on the Committee on the District of Columbia. He was sworn into office on the 4th of March, 1895, and his term expired on the 4th of March, 1897.

He has gone, but his kindly deeds and loving memory will live on and lend comfort to all who knew him for years to come. He died in the Christian faith. He was vestryman of his church when he passed away. He will be missed by his State and his city, and be mourned by a large concourse of friends. His citizenship was of the highest order. His life was worthy of our emulation. And whether birth or death is but the beginning of a brighter future, may all be well with him.

And thus asserting my profound respect for his memory, and in his closing the book upon a useful life I can only say farewell to my friend, a former Member of this House, knowing his deeds will last although his labors have ceased.

Sleep, Holy Spirit,
While the stars burn, the moons increase,
And the great ages onward roll.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Barclay S. Dennison (H. R. 11627, 62d Cong.), no adverse report having been made thereon.

PREPAREDNESS.

The SPEAKER. Under special order, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] is recognized for 30 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest and admiration a few days ago to the remarks of the distinguished Republican leader of this House, who is always interesting and who has always something to say of an illuminating nature, when he was advising both sides of the House as to the position he takes on the question of preparedness. His was a truly American speech [applause], and I was one of those who most warmly congratulated him for it. I think he said, and I agree with him, that this session is one of the most momentous in the history of Congress. We are confronted with problems growing out of the European war and the disturbance on our southwestern borders which call for the highest statesmanship that the men in this Congress can bring to bear upon them, for upon their wise solution will depend in a great measure the future welfare of the country.

Grave issues are confronting us, and there is need of the most disinterested patriotism if they are to be discussed and settled for the Nation's well-being. Let me say at the outset that I am one of those who believe in getting ready. I stand firmly and unchangeably for a program of preparedness. [Applause.] And let me say also that I believe a policy of preparedness, involving a change at variance with all the traditions of the past, is not to be lightly entered upon, but must be viewed calmly in all its bearings before a judicious decision may be reached. No one man's ipse dixit can be a reason for bringing about such a far-reaching change, and we must remember this fact. The measure is fraught with consequences too tremendous for the future, and the collective wisdom of Congress will be put to the test to find the adequate and proper solution. In my judgment in no other manner will we be able to agree on the kind of preparedness that this country now needs.

Mr. Speaker, we must be calm in the discussion of these new questions that have arisen, and we must be just in our view in judging of events and their bearing upon our national life, and our decision must be free from every other consideration than the welfare of this Nation.

How necessary this temper of mind is in the present crisis is apparent to anyone who has been following the trend of recent events. If at any time within the last decade of years before the opening of the European war anyone were to prophesy that the Congress of these United States would shortly be engaged in discussing the ways and means to meet the aggressions of an European foe and would be considering the advisability of creating an enormous military and naval establishment and of increasing to an unheard-of extent the burden of taxation, such a prophet of evil would be laughed to scorn.

Yet, strange to say, such is the unexpected turn events have taken. How did it happen that we, who were pursuing the ways of peace, free from entanglements of European politics, with no enemies on our borders whom we need fear, and with no cause of offense before the great warring nations, but equally at peace and on friendly terms with them all, should suddenly feel ourselves menaced with danger and forced to think of making a violent leap into the costly business of military and naval expenditure on an enormous scale? How did all this come about? Who is responsible for it? Is anyone guilty? Or must the blame be placed merely upon the logic of events? These are questions of vital and far-reaching importance. Upon the answer to be given to them will depend in a great measure the character of the action we are about to take. Mr. Speaker, the country has a right to know the answer, for its supreme interests are involved. It is the duty of every Representative of the people to find out where blame should be put, if blame there be, that he may act intelligently and patriotically for the best interests of the Nation.

Oh, I wish that the Farewell Address of Washington, the Father of his Country, had been in our hands for constant study since the opening of this dire conflict on the other side of the Atlantic! The one admonition which stands out in that imperishable document and which has had more to do in shaping our traditional policy with the nations of Europe than any other influence is his warning to beware of entangling alliances with them. I take these words in their fullest and broadest sense. I believe that the mind of Washington was that we should be not only neutral in their quarrels but absolutely impartial. He was a wise man and a great patriot. Would that his advice had been followed and that we could appear before the world to-day, as I think he would have us appear, without even the suspicion of favoring one side or the other.

When this tremendous war broke out we were in peaceful and friendly relations with all the belligerents. As far as human prudence can foresee our providential mission was to maintain strict neutrality and the friendship of each and all. It was not our quarrel; we were in no way involved. The future of our country depended in no way whatsoever upon the result of the contest. We had been kept free for almost a hundred years from war with any real European power. Our plain destiny pointed to the supreme office which should be ours. Our country loved peace and was following in its ways, and everything seemed to indicate that ours was to be the high and noble task of peacemaker.

The President's message on neutrality was received with universal acclaim. We rejoiced in the fact that we were citizens of a free and peaceful country. I want to say now, Mr. Speaker, that did we hold the position to-day which we then occupied the war would be at a close and the belligerents would be looking to neutral and impartial America as to the ark of the covenant to bring about peace. We would to-day occupy a position of moral grandeur never yet held by any nation in the world. We would be the peacemaker of the earth. Can any gain in material prosperity compensate us for the loss of such a high vantage ground? Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly that such an opportunity was allowed to be lost. It may not return again. I deplore the following of mere legality instead of the higher morality and sensitive impartiality and the substitution of economic advantage for the new freedom. Instead of now standing on the heights with our faces turned toward the morning and the dawn of a better era, I fear we are groping in the lowlands, with the conflicting passions which have ever separated men and nations dinning in our ears.

I can not help thinking—and although I say it with all candor, still I utter it with deep regret—that if the policy of "watchful waiting" had been used toward the European war and the one of "alert action" toward Mexico, we should to-day occupy in the world a proud moral eminence, surrounded by the universal gratitude and admiration of the nations. [Applause.] How could we be so shortsighted as to lose such a glorious opportunity? I do not think for a moment it was mere love of money, although that has been always one of the most potent causes of human action. No, Mr. Speaker, I think I can here and now place my finger on what I consider the worst menace in this country to-day. We are hearing much of "hyphenated citizens" and "America first," but the most violent propaganda working among us at the present time and the most dangerous one, to my mind, is the pro-British, whose protagonists reveal in their every utterance that the dominant motive power in their lives is not "America first," but "England first." [Applause.]

I do not know whether it is a disease or a deep-seated predjudice, but it is mischievous and unpatriotic. [Applause.] It is based on a false conception of historic facts, yet it steals all the assurance of truth with the superadded effrontery of humbug. Modesty it has none. It fills the public press with its clamor, and really one begins to think after a while these people are obsessed with the idea that the one mission America has in the world is to save England. And a portion of this press, I am sorry to say, allows its columns to be fed by misinformation and news pervisions supplied from British sources, and its editorial expression is inspired from British "news" agencies, written by interests antagonistic to American peace and well-being.

I refer only to those newspapers that aim to poison the American public mind against the patriotic interests of America, and seek by falsehood, slander, and misrepresentation to set one class of Americans against others. These are the papers responsible for the so-called "hyphen" campaign to discredit a class of American citizens whose loyalty and fidelity to the Republic have been proven on a hundred battle fields. [Applause.]

And what shall I say of our great American statesmen? This much at least: I have no sympathy with the Lodge-Roosevelt-Choate-Root interpretation of history. [Applause.] It is spurious and superficial; it does not get down to the origin of things. They would have us believe that all the fundamental rights we possess are a heritage bequeathed to us by England. I can not accept such a low estimate of American liberties. I do not for a moment acknowledge any such debt. I do not ascribe to any lower source the principle of individual liberty upon which this Government is founded than to the founder of Christianity Himself.

I beg to remind these advocates of a pro-British policy that the Magna Charta to which they are constantly appealing was forced from a reluctant despot, King John, by the barons of England with the help of the Christian Church when that church was one throughout all Christendom. It was simply the translation to the political order of the principle of equality which the church had preached from the beginning. But in the Magna Charta it is quite limited in its scope. The first experiment on a large scale of this principle to political government occurred among us when the framers of the Constitution, acting under the impulse of a higher power, we can not doubt, and as a protest to the tyranny of oligarchical England, established democracy here in its plenitude. [Great applause.]

For 40 years, Mr. Speaker, we enjoyed the blessings of a pure democracy before the effect of this universal application of the rule of the people reached England and brought about the reform of 1832, the first advance of centuries on the part of England toward our democratic ideal. These people who seek to give us any different explanation of the facts of history are not genuine Americans; they are Tories. We have always had them in our history. I do not believe for a moment that America, as we know it to-day, is an offspring of British institutions. I believe she has a character and genius of her own. Discovered after centuries of life had been granted to the nations of the European Continent, the lifting of the veil that concealed her, a feat that was accomplished by the intrepid genius of Columbus, had in it the providential promises of a new future. That providence will be secured if we are all truly Americans first—not in any spurious sense, but in the real meaning of the term—conscious of the high vocation to which we have been called as the crusaders of a new era in which the rights of man occupy the foremost place and the peace of the people is put before the pecuniary advantage of a moment.

Upon Congress devolves the high and noble duty to find some way to lead the country to these higher ideals. There is no nobler work to which the representatives of a free people may set their hands. May the collective wisdom of this Congress find for us the way of safety and of honor that leads to national rectitude and moral grandeur which should be to-day, as they ever will be, the hope and ambition of a free people. [Long-continued applause.]

MEXICO.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is recognized for 40 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact of the killing of many Americans recently in Mexico, the news of the last of which has come to us to-day, the murdering of four American soldiers, confirmation of which I understand has just reached the State Department, I make no apology for talking upon affairs in Mexico.

I think it is a good thing for us to stand by the President in all matters of foreign affairs where we can, but I think it is a better thing for us to stand by our own country. [Applause.]

I want to take for my text to-day a plank from the Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore, and I will apologize to my Democratic friends for reading it, and will assure them that it is not done in malice:

> The constitutional rights of American citizens should protect them on our borders and go with them throughout the world, and every American citizen residing or having property in any foreign country is entitled to and must be given the full protection of the United States Government, both for himself and his property.

That is in the platform upon which Woodrow Wilson was elected, and that is the plank that has been forgotten and superseded by "watchful waiting." What patriotic Democrat can read that plank in his platform to-day breathing, as it does, of patriotism and real red-blood Americanism, and then read the list of assaults, assassinations, and murders in Mexico without a feeling of humiliation and regret? And yet that immortal document of decadent and discredited promises ended with these heroic words:

> Our pledges are made to be kept when in office as well as relied upon during the campaign.

No one doubts the patriotism, the honesty of purpose, and the high ideals of the President in regard to his foreign policy; but it is with regret that I say that I believe that the opinion of the great majority of the American people of all parties to-day is that he is a scholar, a dreamer, a theorist that has been remarkably successful when he has had the power of coercion in dealing with weaker and immature intellects, as strikingly demonstrated in his domineering control of college students and Democratic Congressmen. But in larger affairs he apparently becomes timid and uncertain. Napoleon declared:

> By sticking to no plan you risk being beaten everywhere. The worst fault in the conduct of affairs is vacillation.

Vacillation is the trouble with the Mexican situation. Vacillation has superseded "watchful waiting." Obstinacy and timidity is not an unusual combination even in men of great intellectual ability, especially where the library takes the place of experience.

The President's policy in Mexico is not based upon his party platform. It is characterized by weakness, uncertainty, vacillation, and uncontrollable desire to intermeddle in Mexican affairs. He has not had the courage to go into Mexico nor the courage to stay out.

The President has repeatedly declared that he would not interfere in Mexico nor permit others to do so. At Indianapolis he said:

> Have not European nations taken as long as they wanted and spilled as much blood as they pleased in the settling of their affairs; and shall we deny that right to Mexico because she is weak? No, I say.

At Columbus, Ohio, in his recent speech he said:

> The Mexicans may not know what to do with their government; but that is none of our business, and, so long as I have the power to prevent it, nobody shall "butt in" to alter it for them.

At the notable talk in the White House not long ago to the Democratic National Committee where he referred to other people "talking through their hat," if he is correctly reported, he declared "that the Mexicans can raise all the h— they please; it is none of our business." Remember, the language I am using is not mine but the reported language of the President. Certainly their ability to raise what he so delicately described, ought to satisfy even the President and that wing of the Democratic Party that believes in "watchful waiting."

But if the President had followed these declarations, however un-American and indefensible they may be, it would have been far better for us and probably for Mexico. But his deeds have been strangers to his words. Instead of a policy of "hands off" it has been a policy of constant interference in Mexican affairs.

The President told Huerta that he must not be a candidate; that he would not be recognized. He talked about fair elections and constitutional government, and showed a strong desire not only to control Mexican politics but to go into Mexico and regulate the land system of that country. He sent his secret special agents to Mexico City and became involved in a personal quarrel with Huerta. This controversy reached its climax in the most grotesque and stupendous piece of folly in the history of civilized nations when the President appeared here before Congress and virtually asked that the United States declare war against Huerta, the individual. And, what was even more ridiculous and absurd, it was done. And for what reason? Who to-day will tell us the cause of that action? Americans had been driven from Mexico; American property had been destroyed in Mexico;

American men had been murdered in Mexico; American women had been outraged in Mexico, but all these did not disturb the serenity of "watchful waiting," or recall to the mind of the President the Democratic platform declarations about protecting life and property of American citizens along the border and on foreign soil.

We were told that Huerta was a murderer, an assassin, a usurper and a traitor, and a man that we would never under any circumstances recognize. But Huerta, the individual, not representing Mexico but himself, had refused to salute the American flag on a gasoline launch in a place where it had no right to be; or, to be exact, for the sake of history, Huerta agreed to fire 6 guns in salute, while the President, as I recall, demanded 21. This insult from an assassin and a murderer that we would not in anyway recognize was more than this administration, too proud to fight, could endure. Our magnificent battleship squadron was hurried to Mexican waters, although at that time the Mexican Navy consisted of one old antiquated gunboat. The Army was sent to Mexico, and, after Vera Cruz was bombarded by our Navy, it was landed on Mexican soil. Seventeen of our own soldiers lost their lives and more than 100 Mexicans were killed. We seized the customhouse and carried away more than a million dollars. And all this for what purpose? Why did we go to Mexico and what did we accomplish and why did we return? We were told that a German vessel was about to land a cargo of guns and ammunition, and this was the reason for hurrying our Navy to Mexican waters. But that same German vessel landed its cargo in Mexico. We are told that our Army and Navy went to Mexico to make Huerta apologize. Has anyone read that apology? We are told that our Army and Navy went to Mexico to make Huerta salute the flag. Has anyone heard that salute? And after this magnificent performance we returned again. What did we accomplish and under what pretense did we take the $1,000,000 belonging to Mexico, and what has become of it and where is it now? The immortal general that marched his men up the hill and then marched them down again was a great military genius and won a magnificent victory as compared with our vaudeville and discreditable performance in Mexico.

Many times after we withdrew from Mexico the flag was desecrated and insulted without protest and almost without notice. After the Huerta incident James McManus, an American citizen of high standing, was killed by Mexican soldiers in his own dooryard. The American flag flying over his house was torn down and trampled in the filth of the street. Some weeks afterwards the Secretary of State made a report on this cowardly assassination to the effect that they—meaning the particular bandit that he was at that time assisting—had agreed to pay an indemnity for the killing of McManus, but that he had forgotten whether or not they had agreed to apologize for insulting the flag.

At one time this administration was so sensitive of the sacred honor of our flag that the Army and Navy were used to force a salute, when murder and assassination of our citizens could not provoke action. Again, the trampling of our flag in the dust was such an insignificant trifle that it left no impression on the ponderous intellect of the great preacher of Chautauqua peace at most any cash price.

There are none to-day but what know that the flag-saluting episode was but a mere pretext eagerly sought to invade Mexico and drive out Huerta.

Poor old Huerta! He has "gone home and ta'en his wages." According to our standards he was an old villain, but he at least had courage and ability. His name is written forever among the immortals as the only individual in all the world's history with whom a mighty nation went to war.

And yet we have been told countless times that the administration is entitled to great credit for keeping us out of war with Mexico. If we had landed an army in Japan or Germany or England or any other first-class power; if we had bombarded one of their cities, killed their citizens, landed our army on their soil, seized and carried off their customs revenue, would we have had war? If that is not war, what does it take to make war? Are we entitled to any credit for escaping war only because we bullied and fought a nation too weak and helpless to defend itself?

Our policy in Mexico has earned us the contempt of the world and beyond question has greatly influenced the warring nations of Europe in their present attitude toward us.

Our Mexican fiasco, discrediting and humiliating as it was, taught us nothing. "Watchful waiting" continued to be only a phrase, for we still intermeddled and interfered. The administration still insisted on helping one bandit and highwayman against another. Villa now became the administration's pet. Laudatory letters giving an account of the career of this bloody cutthroat were sent out with the approval, if not at the suggestion, of the State Department. He was permitted to purchase arms and ammunition in the United States, and this was done against the earnest protest and warning from many American citizens and especially those along our international boundary. Some of this very ammunition may have been used in the recent dastardly and cruel murder of Americans.

Negotiations were carried on with Villa and promises made to him, and it seemed as if the administration were going to recognize him as the head of the Mexican Government. But suddenly and without explanation the administration turned to Carranza and began to help him as against Villa. It permitted Carranza to send soldiers and guns and ammunition through American territory to be used against Villa. This act is believed by those who are best fitted to judge to be largely if not entirely responsible for the recent tragedy where 18 Americans were killed—one of the most cruel and unprovoked murders that ever took place in that land of blood and assassination, the details of which are too horrible to relate. It was feared that such would be the result of permitting Mexican troops to pass through our country. Many who had friends in Mexico believed that such action on our part would lead to the slaughter of Americans. Nor can the administration plead that it was not warned of the probable result upon American life if this were permitted. The distinguished gentleman from New Mexico, Senator FALL, wrote the State Department a letter, pointing out the great danger of such action and pleading that no such permission should be given to any of the factions. According to press reports published at the time, the acting governor of Sonora, Carlos Randall, sent to the State Department on October 29 last a protest that reads as follows:

> Urge him (President Wilson) to revoke immediately permission granted Carranza to send troops over American territory into Agua Prieta, because otherwise we will have to lament any fatal consequences on account of the great danger in which all Americans in Sonora will be placed, for it is impossible for me to repress the fury of the people and the army against the American Government for apparent partiality shown in helping one contending Mexican faction, contrary to all rights. I trust the American Government realizes the gravity of the situation and will revoke the many-times repeated permission.

Many other warnings besides these were received, and the administration can not claim that it permitted this action with no idea of what the result might be.

What right had the administration to rely upon the promises of Carranza? They knew that he was the most unreliable, most uncertain, and most untruthful of the entire bunch of bandits with whom they had been dealing.

On the same day that the press carried the warning from the governor of Sonora it published a statement from Cardinal Gibbons, in which he said:

> Poor Mexico! Things are in bad shape there. I have read much in the papers about the final solution of the Mexican situation. I have heard all kinds of promises. But how are we to believe that the problem is solved? Can we place any faith in these promises?
> A man of promises; that is Carranza. He can promise many things. But where are the assurances that these promises will be fulfilled? I am hoping and trusting that the troubles in Mexico are at an end, but I am not sure that Carranza is the man who will bring about these desired conditions.

Cardinal Gibbons spoke the feeling that possessed all those who were familiar with conditions in Mexico. Why did not the administration give heed to such warnings as these and take steps to see that Carranza's promises were carried out?

How could the administration expect any other effect from its action favoring Carranza? For months they had favored Villa. They had given him every promise and encouragement. They had advertised him to the world as a great and good man—a patriot fighting for freedom. It is believed that they had given him a promise of recognition, and that if the report of Gen. Scott should be made public it will prove there was such an arrangement.

Then came the sudden change. Villa was pushed aside and Carranza taken up. It was one of those sudden changes from the White House without explanation, such as we have had upon preparedness, upon the Panama Canal, and upon many other propositions which have so recently characterized Executive action.

When Villa with an army of 13,000 men, that he had led across plains and mountains and waterless, treeless deserts, suffering privations and hardships beyond description, arrived at Augua Prieta, where he expected to find a garrison of 1,500 men, he found instead that it was occupied by a force of more than 5,000, that had been sent there through the United States while he was on his way to capture the place. When he attacked he was repulsed by artillery that had been sent there through this country. Here was the former favorite of the administration that believed that he had been deliberately betrayed by his former friends. What would anyone expect would be the result upon the mind of such a bloody-minded scoundrel as Villa? Is it any wonder that he vowed vengeance against all Americans, and what reason had the administration to think from his career that this vow would not be carried out to the fullest extent in the most cruel and brutal manner?

If we had not the courage to go into Mexico and pacify it, then certainly we ought at least to keep out of this quarrel and not endanger American lives by constantly favoring one faction or the other.

We make a tremendous bluster about the killing of American citizens upon the high seas and fill the air with the tumult and the noise of many typewriters, although the killing is only accidental and undoubtedly really regretted by those who did the act. But so far we have looked with equanimity undisturbed while hundreds of Americans have been purposely foully murdered in Mexico in a most cruel and fiendish manner.

If the people of this country could but read the fearful tale told by the records now hidden in the State Department, if they but knew the truth, they would make the atmosphere so hot that no longer could anyone advocate "watchful waiting" and breathe it and live.

The whole policy of the President in Mexico has been wrong from the very beginning. It has been one of meddling between factions. It has been one of secret and private special agents representing the President personally. It has been a modified plan, followed by Peter the Great, the Cæsars, and the Emperor of China. It has no place in this country. Special agents of this character seldom report the truth. They report what they are expected to report. The plan of cutting off the head of the bearer of bad news is not yet entirely obsolete in political life. The foreign affairs of this Government should be carried on through diplomatic channels, in accordance with the recognized system of modern civilization. Diplomatic chaos supreme and irretrievable would reign in this country under this administration if Col. House were to die.

Pitiless publicity has given way to private, special secret negotiations through personal agents and representatives.

The President says that the Mexicans should have "the right to spill all the blood they please," and it is none of our business. Certainly the American people have regretted this expression of the President. I do not believe that the American people believe in this policy of slaughter and savagery. Certainly this has not always been the policy of this Nation. When the shrieks and groans of murdered and tortured men, the sobs and cries of starving women and children in Cuba reached us the American people demanded that these atrocities should end, and when that demand was disregarded our answer was not "watchful waiting," nor did we tell them that they could shed all the blood that they pleased, nor did we say that it was none of our business, but the American people arose as one man, drove the yellow flag of Spain from the Western Hemisphere, and placed Cuba among the nations of the earth. And the day is not far off when the people of this country, regardless of the attitude of the administration, will see that peace is brought to unhappy Mexico.

The President may believe that the Mexicans have the right to shed all the blood that they please. But I most emphatically deny that the Mexicans have the right to shed American blood upon either American or Mexican soil. Paraphrasing a sentence of the eloquent Ingersoll, "A flag that will not protect its citizens everywhere is a filthy rag that contaminates the air in which it floats."

What are the conditions in Mexico to-day after all this time of "watchful waiting"? Starvation, famine, want, robbery, plunder, rapine, assassination, and murder. Every crime and every cruelty that ignorance and hate can invent has been perpetrated, and still there is no end. The only thing that profits by the conditions in that unhappy land is the eager vulture that circles above the scene of slaughter waiting to feed and fatten upon the dead and dying. Dante's hell could add nothing to the horrors of that unfortunate country.

Whenever the question of Mexico is discussed some Democrat in his solemn majesty arises and, with a look of superior wisdom, inquires, What would you do? That question is a confession on the part of the administration of their inability to deal with the situation. Almost any Republican can advise the adininistration to the advantage of the country upon this question if it will follow the advice.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. What was the policy of President Taft in Mexico when similar circumstances were transpiring there?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. In the first place there were no "similar circumstances" under President Taft; but if President Taft made a mistake, it is no excuse for the present administration.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Is it not a fact that ex-President Taft has practically indorsed the policy of Woodrow Wilson in Mexico?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. President Taft has done some very unwise things, but I do not think he ever went that far. You can not expect a great man to always be right.

Mr. SCHALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. SCHALL. Does the gentleman know whether Turtle Island is fortified by the Japanese?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I have no information whatever on the subject.

Speaking for myself, but believing that I voice the sentiment of the American people, there are some things that I would do in regard to Mexico if upon me rested the responsibility. I would either go into Mexico and pacify the country or I would keep my hands entirely out of Mexico. If we are too proud to fight we should be too proud to quarrel. I would not choose between murderers. I would not permit either side to procure guns or ammunition in this country that may hereafter be used to murder Americans. I would not depend upon secret personal agents for my information. I would deal openly and in the light of day with the Mexican situation. I would practice pitiless publicity as well as preach it. I would give the American people the facts. I would let them know the truth, and if that is done the American people will quickly decide what shall be done. And, above all, I would do this, the thing that should have been done more than three years ago, and if it had been done, the letting of American blood in Mexico would not have occurred; I would serve notice upon all factions that no longer would any of them be permitted, under any pretense whatever, to destroy American property or to murder American men or to ravish American women, and back of that notice I would place the power of this great Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back 10 minutes.

PREPAREDNESS.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I know there are a great number of Members of the House of Representatives who are anxious to become leaders. Every good man wants power, to wield it for a good purpose, even though bad men want it for bad purposes. Knowing the love of power to be almost universal and that my colleagues entertain the desire for leadership, I have requested these 15 minutes to give them consolation and some pointers.

This morning's Philadelphia Inquirer has a leading editorial entitled "Congressman MANN as a real leader." I can not read it all—it would take too much time—but I will read the first paragraph. It says:

> The vigorous and clearly defined speech of Congressman MANN in favor of strengthening the Army and Navy, and his eloquent plea to make this a national and not a partisan or political question, lifts him into immediate prominence as the real leader of this most important movement.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Thereby all previous floppers are relegated to the rear. [Laughter.] And this is made the true slogan of leadership—that he who makes the latest flop shall lead us all. [Laughter.]

Now, this latest feat occurred in the garden of my distinguished friend the gentleman from Illinois. He was sitting in his garden—not working in his garden—meditating, and a vision of blighting war came o'er his dreams. He saw this country in deadly strife with the greatest naval power in the world—England—and he decided certain things that he thought ought to be divulged to the House and the country. I wish I was in the secret of the dreams that came to haunt his vision and disturb his peace when he saw his country locked in a struggle with this great naval power, seeing that he had just gone to his garden from a session of Congress where he had led the fight against a larger Navy.

In that session, occurring a few months before this garden meditation, my friend thought the American Navy was greater than that of England——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Germany.

Mr. DIES. Germany; and he argued that point on page 2673 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Then he thought that $1,000,000 in the naval bill was too much for air craft, and he proposed to cut it down to $500,000, as you will see at page 2881. He then thought that $1,300,000 was quite too much for air craft in the Army bill, and proposed to cut it down to $600,000.

Before this garden meditation, in the Congress which preceded it, he made the point of order against $400,000 for marine barracks, as you will see at page 2888. He also made a point of order against $500,000 to complete the radio stations, as you will see at page 2922 of the RECORD. He also made a point of order against two first-class battle cruisers——

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Amen! [Laughter.]

Mr. DIES. That is what we all said when he was leading that fight.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. I say it now.

Mr. DIES. While no record of the vote appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, it is not to be doubted that the gentleman from Illinois voted against the amendment to bring into the bill 16 submarines, instead of only 2 as proposed in the bill. Finally he voted against two battleships and in favor of one. He would have done more against the bill, but for the fact that there is a courtesy among leaders, when they are leading an assault upon a bill, that they shall not all assault it at the same time. Other leaders were assaulting different parts of the bill, while the gentleman from Illinois was assaulting these particular parts.

These other leaders, I may say, have meditated in their garden during the vacation between the last session of Congress and this. They will be heard from later as to their attitude, and disclose their garden meditations to the American public.

Page 2108 of the RECORD. Mr. MANN adduces some irresistible logic against the colossal expenditure for the American Navy. I suppose his logic in the meditation in the garden went to smash along with the views he expressed a few months previous. He said on page 2108:

> In making reasonable provision for war, that is all we ought to be expected to do; it would be foolish, it seems to me, for any country to spend all of its resources in preparing for war and neglect other things which are much more important.

That brings me to the question which I would like to ask of this new leader with reference to his statement that we should prepare for a greater Navy than Great Britain—I wish he would state to the House the cost of building a navy equal to that of Great Britain. I wish he would suggest to the House the cost of maintaining an American Navy equal to that of Great Britain. I wish he would state in specific terms to the House how much the building program of the American Navy would be if we are to keep pace with Great Britain.

It is easy to glibly say at one session that we will construct but one battleship and be against submarines and aviation, and then, after meditation in the garden, the next session propose that we shall embark upon a program which no political party would stand for, a program which the gentleman himself when reduced to figures would not stand for.

Mr. Speaker, a little later on in the session I shall crave the indulgence of the House, when I can have the time, to discuss the whole preparedness question. I also have meditated somewhat in my garden during the summer, and my meditations were just about what my votes and speeches were when I followed the leadership of the gentleman from Illinois against these large expenditures.

A year ago Germany, England, and all Europe were at war, and a year ago the same state of international politics existed as now, and it naturally produces a lurking suspicion, in my mind at least, that these gentlemen were not so much meditating in their gardens as they were reading the great metropolitan newspapers of the country, which have not published the truth in regard to the American Navy.

The American Navy, which the gentleman from Illinois said was greater than the German a year ago, in spite of his assault on the program, received the largest appropriation in its entire history. In the two years of Mr. Wilson's administration more money was appropriated for the construction of the Navy than in the entire four years of President Taft or in any four years of the Terrible Teddy. Admiral Fletcher says that it is 15 per cent stronger to-day than it was a year ago. To-day the marksmanship of the American Navy is 30 per cent better than it was a year ago. These European Governments, which a year ago, according to the leader from Illinois, were bleeding to death along the lines of Russia and France, have shed oceans of blood and issued billions of bonds. There is less excuse for hysteria to-day than there was a year ago. [Applause.]

There is more need for statesmanship than a year ago, with moving pictures running in this city illustrating the devastation of our country, the ravaging of our homes, all calculated to drive the American people war mad. I wish the gallant leader from Illinois had continued to do battle for the best traditions of our country instead of following off after this maudling moving-picture campaign, which shows the destruction of our Navy and the invasion of our country without the loss of a single foreign life upon our shores. [Applause.]

INTERNATIONAL HIGH COMMISSION.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill H. R. 8235, to provide for the maintenance of the United States section of the International High Commission.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill 8235, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bill H. R. 8235, to provide for the maintenance of the United States section of the International High Commission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I ask that the bill be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby given authority, with the approval of the President, to request the United States section of the International High Commission to cooperate with the other sections of the commission on determining the most satisfactory means of carrying out the recommendations of the First Pan American Financial Conference.

For the purpose of meeting such actual and necessary expenses on the part of the United States section of the commission as may arise from its work and investigations, or as may be incidental to its attendance at the meeting of the said International High Commission, the sum of $40,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to be immediately available, and to remain available until expended.

The Clerk also read the following committee amendment:

Page 1, strike out lines 3 to 9, both inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the appointment of the nine delegates by the Secretary of the Treasury to represent the United States in the proceedings of the International High Commission to be held in Buenos Aires, Argentina, during the year 1916, in accordance with the action of the First Pan American Financial Conference held in Washington during the year 1915, pursuant to the provisions of an act of Congress, approved March 4, 1915, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916,' be, and the same is hereby, approved and confirmed; such delegates shall be known as the United States section of the International High Commission and shall cooperate with the other sections of the commission in taking action upon the recommendations of the First Pan American Financial Conference; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to fill any vacancies that may occur in the United States section of said international commission."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, if it is intended by the passage of this bill to approve any agreement entered into between the different representatives of these countries at the last meeting of that commission?

Mr. FLOOD. No; it is not. The international high commission will consider the suggestions made by the financial conference and put them into such shape as they think proper and make recommendations to the legislative bodies of the different countries with reference to them. These recommendations will have no effect unless they are approved by the legislative bodies of the various countries.

Mr. WINGO. Is it intended that this commission at its next meeting shall take up any propositions tending to an alliance between this country and the South American countries with reference to Pan American affairs?

Mr. FLOOD. It is intended to take up business propositions with reference to bills of exchange and matters of business intercourse and make recommendations to the legislative bodies of the different countries with a view to bringing about a uniformity in business transactions.

Mr. WINGO. It is intended to limit their work entirely to financial and commercial exchanges?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. No political agreements of any kind?

Mr. FLOOD. None whatever.

Mr. WINGO. That would enter into the foreign or domestic policy of the United States or any of those countries?

Mr. FLOOD. None whatever. It would not deal with any such question.

Mr. WINGO. Is it intended that the positions of these delegates appointed on the part of the United States shall be permanent?

Mr. FLOOD. No; they are appointed for this one conference.

Mr. WINGO. This particular meeting?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; and this appropriation is made for this particular meeting and to bear the expenses that will be incurred between now and the time of meeting and the making of the report to Congress and the publishing of the proceedings of the meeting.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand the gentleman, they are to report whatever their recommendations are to this Congress for action. Of course, any agreement that had to do with foreign affairs would have to take the form of a treaty between the countries affected and would have to be reported to the Senate. Is the gentleman advised whether it is intended to consult the Congress upon any arrangement they may make with reference to financial or commercial agreements?

Mr. FLOOD. Any suggestions that this international commission, composed of not more than nine delegates from each of the 20 or 21 American Republics, shall make will be reported to Congress, and Congress can accept or reject them.

Mr. WINGO. There is no intention to bind the United States through its executive departments to any kind of financial, commercial, or diplomatic arrangements?

Mr. FLOOD. No; it would have no binding effect at all until it is passed by Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in the Committee on the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8235.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8235, with Mr. DIES in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If no one desires to be heard on general debate, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if no one else desires to be heard, I do. I think the gentleman from Virginia ought to explain something about the bill and also something about what this conference did at its meetings last summer while it was here. I believe that it was said that a report was sent to each Member of Congress, and doubtless that is true, but it was sent during the summer, probably, when no one was here. At least I never received any copy of the report of what the conference did.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, in the winter of last year Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo conceived the idea of bringing together in a conference the financiers and business men of all the American Republics, with a view to strengthen the ties of friendship existing between these countries and to bring about closer and more important trade relations between them.

His idea was heartily indorsed by the President, the Secretary of State, and the Congress, and provision was made in the 1916 diplomatic and consular appropriation bill for this conference to be held in Washington. An appropriation of $50,000 was carried in that bill to defray the expenses of it.

This conference was held in this city last May and was attended by a large number of the important financial and commercial men of this country and 18 of the Central and South American countries.

The conference was in session for almost a week, and one of the results of its deliberation was the passage of a resolution unanimously recommending the appointment by each of the countries represented in the conference of a section of an international high commission, which was charged with the duty of perfecting the suggestions made by the conference, and after these suggestions had been perfected of submitting them to their several Governments for adoption or rejection.

This commission was empowered to take up particularly the questions of a currency and exchange standard, the law of negotiable instruments, fiscal and custom regulations, rules for commercial travelers, patent and copyright legislation, and an extension of the process of arbitration for the adjustment of commercial disputes and other matters.

The proposition for such an international high commission was readily adopted by all of the countries concerned, and all of them have appointed sections of this commission.

The suggestion was that each country should appoint not more than nine members of the commission, which should be known as the section of the commission for that particular country. The 19 countries, including the United States, have made their appointments.

It was provided that in each country the secretary of the treasury, or the finance minister, should be the chairman of the section of the commission from his country. Soon after the conference adjourned, Secretary McAdoo named the United States section of the International High Commission, and it has done much work toward preparing the suggestions which will be made at the meeting of the high commission. The Argentine Government has extended a cordial invitation for the International High Commission to meet in Buenos Aires on April 3, 1916. This invitation has been accepted by all of the countries involved.

The purpose of this bill is to make an appropriation to bear the expenses arising from the appointment of the United States section of the International High Commission, to confirm the appointments of the United States section made by Secretary McAdoo, and to give our section an official status not less definite than that enjoyed by the sections of the commission of other countries.

This appropriation is asked for by the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out these purposes. It is indorsed by the Secretary of State and the President.

I hold in my hand a letter from the President, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

JANUARY 12, 1916.

Hon. HENRY D. FLOOD,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FLOOD: I hope that you will not consider it an unwarranted liberty on my part if I write to urge very strongly the appropriation of $40,000 for carrying on the work of the United States section of the International High Commission appointed as a result of the action of the Pan American Financial Conference. All of the Central and South American Republics have appointed their sections of this commission; the work of the commission was initiated by the action of the United States; our relations with the Central and South American countries are now upon a happier footing than ever before; and it seems to me of vital consequence for the support of one of the most important parts of our foreign policy that we should sustain our own portion of this work now so successfully inaugurated and progressing so admirably.

Cordially and sincerely, yours, WOODROW WILSON.

The conception of this conference by Secretary McAdoo was a wise piece of statesmanship; the dignity with which he presided over the conference, and the ability with which he has handled all matters raised by the conference, or suggested by it, has won the admiration of those of all countries who attended the conference or have kept in touch with it.

I will say, Mr. Chairman, that I attended this conference, and the ability with which the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States presided over the conference and the ability and energy with which he has since carried out the suggestions arising from that conference has met the approval of the representatives of all the countries which had representatives in that conference; and I believe he is entitled to the highest commendation on the part of our people.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Of course I did not attend that conference, was not here, and have not read the proceedings of the conference. I did read something in the newspapers concerning it, but I am perfectly well aware that that is not always the way to get at what a body really does; but I got the impression somehow, I suppose from something I saw in the newspapers, that the main purpose of this conference when it met was to boost the McAdoo shipping bill. Now, the gentleman was there, and he will know whether that was the case or not.

Mr. FLOOD. I was there, Mr. Chairman, and I know that was not the case.

In the first place, all of the delegates of the foreign countries were, by the action of the United States Congress, the guests of the Nation. It was not possible, and certainly it was not desirable, that they should be forbidden to express their views upon any question which they thought was vital to the commercial and financial interests of Central and South America and the United States. The expressed purposes of the conference were to promote more intimate financial relations between the countries represented in the conference, and, of necessity, everything material to the discussion was properly brought forward. Before the conference assembled in Washington the delegates from Argentina and Chile expressed themselves in newspaper interviews in New York to the effect that the most important thing to be done for the strengthening and development of our financial and commercial relations with South and Central America was the prompt provision of adequate steamship service. They regarded this as of paramount importance. As practical business men they realized that no other element in the structure of international trade was of such absolute and objective necessity.

On the first day of the conference, May 24, 1915, the chairman of the Argentine delegation, Dr. Samuel Hale Pearson, addressed the conference as follows:

Mr. President, before finishing the session of to-day I would like to say that this morning we heard with great pleasure and satisfaction the words of His Excellency the President of the United States with regard to the ability to strengthen the relations between our countries of North, Central, and South America if we had fast and good steamship communications. I am sure that every one of us here present—I mean of all the Americas—would be very pleased if the honorable Secretary of the Treasury would name a special commission of a few of the principal citizens and most interested men who could give the best ideas as to how to form this combination of North, Central, and South America, united in a special commission that we might call the "commission on fast navigation," to work out a plan whereby with individual capital or with the help of our Governments we could in a short time see a powerful steamship line that would help us to develop our common intercourse and at the same time know that we would be free from having to depend on European powers for the transportation of our merchandise and also to bring us here and to take you south, as we want all the Americas to know each other as we have been accustomed to knowing Europe.

On the following day, May 25, the Secretary of the Treasury appointed a committee representing the South American Republics most interested, namely, Argentina, Brazil, Uruguay, Chile, Peru, and Ecuador, and appointed to represent the United States on the same committee Hon. Edward N. Hurley, of the Federal Trade Commission; Mr. R. Goodwin Rhett, of the United States Chamber of Commerce; Mr. Paul Fuller, of New York; Col. Franklin Q. Brown, of New York; Mr. George W. Norris, of Philadelphia; Mr. Harry A. Wheeler, of Chicago; and Mr. J. G. White, of New York. Manifestly he could not do less, as presiding officer of the conference, than to accede to the wishes of our foreign guests and permit this important subject to be discussed and considered by a committee of the conference and later by the conference itself.

At the seventh session of the conference, May 29, 1915, the committee on transportation submitted its report.

As a result of the discussion and by unanimous vote of the conference, including not only the foreign delegates but those representing the United States, the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this conference that improved ocean transportation facilities between the countries composing the Pan American Union has become a vital and imperative necessity, and that every effort should be made to secure, at the earliest possible moment, such improved means of ocean transportation, since it is of primary importance to the extension of trade and commerce and improved financial relations between the American Republics.

When this resolution was introduced an attempt was made to inject the discussion of the shipping laws of the United States through the offer of an amendment, which the Secretary of the Treasury, as presiding officer, declined to entertain because it had relation to national policies, with which he thought the conference could not properly deal.

On pages 283 and 284 he used the following language:

Now, as I said before, this is not a convention for the purpose of determining national policies. It is a conference for the purpose of exchanging views, laying upon the table all facts and information obtained, together with expressions of opinion from the various countries represented here as to what things are needed, with suggested possible remedies. These are to be sifted by you, and we are going to try to extract from this crucible into which we put all of these suggestions some refined thing which we hope will work to the advantage of our respective countries.

I would therefore suggest that we confine our expression to the resolution which Gov. Francis has offered. I do not think that we are here to discuss government ownership or subsidies or any other such matter. That has become rather a political controversy in this country, and this is not the place to thrash it out.

Dr. Pearson, of Argentina, seconded the resolution above quoted, which was put to the conference and adopted unanimously.

On page 290 Mr. Roger W. Babson, of Boston, asked the chairman if he would consider a motion to have the Secretary of the Treasury appoint a committee from this country on a shipping bill, and so forth. His reply was as follows:

I think it would be unwise to do that. It seems just a bit outside of the scope of this conference. The shipping question here has become very much of a political question, and I am most anxious that politics shall not be injected into this meeting in any form at all.

The gentleman will see from this that the conference was not used at all to boost the shipping bill.

Mr. MANN. I gave, with some reluctance, my personal assent to the provision that became the law and made the appropriation last spring, and yet when I read the newspapers it must have been that I got the impression from them that the conference was being used, it seemed to me, wholly politically, though I did not credit it, as I often do not credit everything I see in print. It seemed impossible that a man like Secretary McAdoo would make use of such an occasion for political purposes. So I am glad to have in the RECORD the statement which has been made.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; and I am glad to make it. I was myself very much impressed with the dignity and ability and force with which the Secretary of the Treasury presided over that conference and the intimate knowledge he showed of every question that was raised before it. I was there when this particular matter came up, and I do know that he did everything he could with propriety to prevent any kind of discussion of the question referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and I am very glad to have been able to make this statement here. Of course we know, Mr. Chairman, that our political opponents will criticize things we do, whether there is justification for the criticism or not. And some of the newspapers did refer to this matter in criticism of the Secretary.

I am going to take occasion to refer briefly to the very severe attack which has been made upon the Mexican policy of the administration by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] in his speech to-day. I hope some time in the near future to get an opportunity to reply in detail to that attack, and I am satisfied I can show to this House and demonstrate to the country that the course pursued by President Wilson in reference to Mexico is the only course that any administration could have pursued with due regard to the honor and interests of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The one happy circumstance arising out of the present distressing condition of the world is that it has brought the Americas closer together. This situation and the tendency of the cooperation which has resulted therefrom has been strengthened by every act of the present administration. [Applause.]

The President, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of the Treasury have accomplished great results in replacing the feeling of suspicion and distrust with which we were regarded by our Pan American neighbors with a feeling of trust and generous cooperation and affection. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Our political opponents will, of course, criticize the administration and the majority party, but when the time comes we will appeal from that criticism to the American people upon the record of the Democratic administration and the Democratic Congresses, confident that the people will sustain that record and give the country the blessing of another Democratic administration. [Applause.]

The Wilson administration has drawn the Americas closer together, it has brought prosperity to the entire country, and it has kept us out of war. [Applause.]

To-day we are the only great Nation in the world throughout whose borders peace and prosperity walk hand in hand. These splendid facts will not be forgotten by the people and will give Woodrow Wilson a second term in the White House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania and Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it seems entirely proper, in view of the depleted condition in which the Treasury of the United States finds itself, that we should discuss this problem of financing South America. It is another one of those interesting problems of the present administration that diverts attention from the difficulty that confronts it in the way of raising resources to run the country. But that is not altogether what I want to say.

The distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], who has risen from the floor to the Chair, and who now presides with great grace over this body, is axiomatic. A little while ago he paraphrased the familiar quotation "He who laughs last laughs best" by suggesting that "He who makes the latest flop shall lead us all." And he had the temerity and the courage, in this present day and generation of kaleidoscopic changes on the part of a Democratic administration, to apply that suggestion to the Republican leader because, in his wisdom, after holding to certain principles of economy in times of peace he suggested that this country should prepare itself against the possibility of an attack.

Now, in all fairness, gentlemen, if he "who flops last is to lead us," then how are we to regard the present occupant of the White House? Is it not apparent, when it comes to the question of flopping, that as a flopper upon great public questions, as a flopper in the face of a platform that he was pledged to live up to, there has never been the superior of the present leader of the Democratic Party? [Applause on the Republican side.]

CHANGES OF FRONT.

Upon this question of a tariff board—and, for the sake of relieving the suspense of the country we may call it a tariff commission—let us consider the announcement which came from the White House only yesterday. After destroying a Republican tariff board, that was as effective as any commission can be under the Constitution; after supposedly covering the powers of such a board in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce; after "sneaking", a provision into the so-called trade commission bill that was to give ample powers to the administration for all the purposes of a tariff board or tariff commission, or whatever it might be, we find the gentlemen who marched up the hill upon the Baltimore platform coming down yesterday morning, with the announcement from the White House that after a conference with the distinguished leader of the Democratic Party in this House the program for the future is to include "a tariff commission bill that is to be reported by the Committee on Ways and Means." Speaking of flopping, which is akin to a change of front, the doing to-day that which you promised yesterday not to do—let us see where the leader of Democracy stands in this matter.

WHAT THE PRESIDENT SAID.

In his letter of acceptance to that assembled multitude of Democrats who wandered over to the shores of Jersey two and one-half years ago, the Democratic nominee for the Presidency said.

It is obvious that the changes we make—

And this was with respect to the tariff—

should be made only at such a rate and in such a way as will least interfere with the normal and healthful course of commerce and manufacture. But we shall not on that account act with timidity, as if we did not know our own minds, for we are certain of our ground and of our object.

Mark you, then, when the Democrats had destroyed the Republican tariff board, when you believed that you were in a position to establish a system that would be an improvement upon it, you did not proceed as your candidate for President then said, as if you "did not know your own minds," because you were "certain of your ground." Yes; as certain of your ground as you were when in that speech delivered at Washington Park, N. J., some time after, your same candidate for President declared that that platform which you had adopted at Baltimore was "not molasses with which to catch flies," but was to be lived up to even though in the course of time those who rebelled against it might "be hanged as high as Haman."

Your President "knew his ground" when he was a candidate. You followed him faithfully, believing you knew your ground when you destroyed the institution of protection and that tariff board which the Republican Party had provided for the ascertainment of tariff facts.

THE REPUBLICAN TARIFF IDEA.

Mark the difference. President Taft in his letter of acceptance on August 1, 1912, said:

The American people may rest assured that should the Republican Party be restored to power in all legislative branches all the schedules in the present tariff of which complaint is made will be subjected to investigation and report by a competent and impartial tariff board, and to the reduction or change which may be necessary to square the rates with the facts.

Let us carry the contrast a little further. In your party platform at Baltimore you declared against the constitutional right of the Federal Government to impose or collect tariff duties except for the purpose of revenue. You denounced the Republican tariff system and appealed "to the American people to support us in our demand for a tariff for revenue only." The Republican platform adopted at Chicago, on the other hand, declared for protection as usual, and for information that—can best be obtained by an expert commission as to the large volume of useful facts contained in the recent report of the Tariff Board.

The following quotation from the Republican platform is highly illuminating at the present time:

The pronounced feature of modern industrial life is its enormous diversification. To apply tariff rates justly to these changing conditions requires closer study and more scientific methods than ever before. The Republican Party has shown by its creation of a Tariff Board its recognition of this situation and its determination to be equal to it. We condemn the Democratic Party for its failure either to provide funds for the continuance of this board or to make some other provision for securing the information requisite for intelligent tariff legislation. We protest against the Democratic method of legislating on these vitally important subjects without careful investigation.

CUTTING DOWN OUR INDUSTRIES.

Thus the issue was joined upon which the campaign of 1912 was fought out. Your candidate, observing the destruction of the Republican Tariff Board, "knew his ground." We promised to restore that Tariff Board in order that the President and the Congress might ascertain the facts upon which to base the legislation which would bring sufficient revenue into the Treasury to run the country without internal taxes. But your President, who knew his mind, and who said your platform was "not molasses to catch flies," was not convinced. He "knew his ground" when he came into the House of Representatives on the 8th of April, 1913, to deliver his first message from the "throne." He held the same views then that he held when he was a candidate. He was not yet prepared to "flop" on the question of the Tariff Commission, for with respect to the situation he then said:

Only new principles of action will save us from a final hard crystallization of monopoly and a complete loss of the influences that quicken enterprise and keep independent energy alive. It is plain what those principles must be. We must abolish everything that bears even the semblance of privilege or of any kind of artificial advantage, and put our business men and producers under the stimulation of a constant necessity to be efficient, economical, and enterprising, masters of competitive supremacy, better workers and merchants than any in the world. Aside from the duties laid upon articles which we do not, and probably can not, produce, therefore, and the duties laid upon luxuries and merely for the sake of the revenues they yield, the object of the tariff duties henceforth laid must be effective competition, the whetting of American wits by contest with the wits of the rest of the world.

THE TRADE COMMISSION INCIDENT.

Your President, now enthroned in his high office, still did not change his mind. Experience in the raising of revenues, with the Treasury fast running low, even did not make him change his mind, for out yonder at Indianapolis a year or so ago the President made another address, in which he told of the effectiveness of the Democratic tariff for revenue system. That was the address in which he reminded the country that the Republican Party had had no new ideas for 30 years, and was competent only "to sit upon the lid." That was when he told the country that in this matter of exercising jurisdiction over the tariff rates he had "put one over us" on the Republican side by "slipping into" the Trade Commission bill a provision which gave it ample powers.

We had been told in a discussion in the House, and we knew it for a fact, that in abolishing the Republican Tariff Board the Democratic Party relied for its influence upon the Bureau of Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which it created as an excuse for abolishing the Bureau of Manufactures. The claim upon your side then was that you had full authority to ascertain tariff facts. You reiterated your claim under your trade-commission bill, and the President reasserted it yonder in Indianapolis; but it must be recalled that neither you nor he had then prepared to flop.

SPEECH AT INDIANAPOLIS.

In that remarkable speech at Indianapolis, the President, speaking of the "scientific handling of the tariff question," said:

That kind of science I do not care to know anything about, except enough to stop it. But if by scientific treatment of the tariff they mean adjustment to the actual trade conditions of America and the world, then I am with them; and I want to call their attention—for though they voted for it they apparently have not noticed it—to the fact that the bill which creates the new Trade Commission does that very thing. We were at pains to see that it was put in there. That commission is authorized and empowered to inquire into and report to Congress not only upon all the conditions of trade in this country, but upon the conditions of trade, the cost of manufacture, the cost of transportation—all the things that enter into the question of the tariff—in foreign countries as well as in the United States, and into all those questions of foreign combinations which affect international trade between Europe and the United States. It has the full powers which will guide Congress in the scientific treatment of questions of international trade.

It was not thought necessary, even for political purposes, to change front on the "scientific" and "efficiency" tariff platform at that time. Assured Democratic methods were good enough. The administration had ample authority to do as it pleased.

WHO "PUT ONE OVER"?

"Full powers." Why, if you did not have it before, this provision that the President suggests was "put over us" on this side of the House in the passage of the trade commission bill gave you ample power. The President asserted it and reasserted it. He "knew his ground." But—

Being by profession a schoolmaster—

He says—

I am glad to point that out to a class of uninstructed Republicans, though I have not always taught in the primary grade.

No, sir; the President was no novice at this tariff business. It was not new to him. He was "a schoolmaster" who had taught yonder at Princeton; he had told the boys about it, and they believed it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa and Mr. ADAMSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. ADAMSON. I just wanted to say, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman from Georgia will pardon me, the gentleman from Pennsylvania yielded to me.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will gladly yield to the gentleman from Georgia in a moment.

Mr. ADAMSON. And I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa, and with pleasure.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The President uses the expression that the Republicans, though they voted for it, did not know it. As I remember that matter, when the provision was considered by the House there was an elaborate discussion. Am I not correct about it?

THE SCHOOLMASTER DEFENDED.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes. There was an elaborate discussion, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made a very strong speech on this proposition, in which it will be found that the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. Stevens, had something to do with the introduction of that paragraph in the Trade Commission bill. And I think, if the record be brought forth, it will be found that the President had nothing to do with that provision, but claimed it on his arrival at Indianapolis.

Now I yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the extended conversation between the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania and the equally distinguished gentleman from Iowa has removed me from the context where I wished to make a remark to the gentleman. [Laughter.] Was the gentleman alluding to the fact that our distinguished Executive was the schoolmaster? If so, I wish to remind him of the old adage that the schoolmaster is abroad in the land, and to remember that on election day he will be still more prevalent in the land. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If that is the opinion down in Georgia, I fear it does not prevail throughout the country; but the President will probably know more about it when he returns from the stumping tour he is now conducting with the view of convincing the people differently.

Mr. ADAMSON. Oh, the gentleman need not be timorous.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Georgia has more fear than the gentleman from Pennsylvania has. I think the discussion has become so hot at this particular point that the gentleman from Georgia will probably not pursue the discussion further.

THINKS THE PRESIDENT WILL BE REELECTED.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; of course.

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to say to my friend that my fears are all imaginary, and not like those on his part; and I have not only hope but faith, which is the substance of things hoped for. And I am not like the old negro preacher whom the genial gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] speaks about, who preached a sermon at the funeral of a friend of somewhat doubtful life, and said, "I do not know much about my friend, this old nigger, but I hope he has gone where I am afraid he aint." [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think I can say to the gentleman, paraphrasing Mr. HEFLIN'S story, to which he has made such happy allusion, that I have heard of instances where even a Georgian could go awry as a political prophet. I think that confidence in the future which the gentleman professes is not indulged by Democracy generally, and particularly not by the Representatives upon this side of the House.

BUILDING UP AGAINST REPUBLICANS.

Mr. Chairman, we were discussing the manner in which the President and the Democratic Party had built up their case as against the Republican tariff board. They had reached that point where they had no hesitancy about asserting the completeness and the efficiency of their laws to administer the tariff as they saw fit and as they thought would produce the revenue necessary to run the country. But now the sad second chapter of that story may be opened up in a reference to the financial figures, which, after all, are the best test of the efficiency of an administration. The whole issue between the Republicans and the Democrats in the last campaign was as to the method of raising revenue. We contended that it should be raised by taxing the foreigner upon the goods he sent into the United States, thus protecting American labor and American business men by keeping wages high here and not compelling them to go to the foreign level. We contended that we could raise this revenue at the customhouses, and that it would relieve the people of the burden of internal taxation, such as income tax and a war tax, and things of that kind, which the Democrats have been forced to resort to in order to save their faces. And we could have done so, but the people believed the prophets of the economic evil that was to come.

THE CHANGE ON THE SURFACE.

From day to day, under the Democratic system, the Treasury reports show that the tariff-for-revenue policy initiated by the President, and which he stood for even up to his Indianapolis speech, was not effective; on the contrary, it forced internal taxation, forced heavy burdens upon the backs of the people, and took away the employment of hundreds of thousands under the operation of the law despite the accident of the European war. But, Mr. Chairman, "the proof of the pudding," even though distasteful, "is in the eating of it," and over the surface of the Democratic moon has come a change. The tariff-for-revenue system is not productive, and the President has come to view the situation in a different light than that which illumined his thought in that rather chipper speech at Indianapolis. The Secretary of Commerce, that Secretary who probably wrote the word "efficiency" in the President's first message delivered here from "the throne"—that Secretary who seemed to think we could live upon bookkeeping in this country.

BOOKKEEPING AND TAXES.

Bookkeeping and formality and supervision which even the smallest employer of labor might comprehend as readily as the greatest corporation; that Secretary who was keeping in touch with the Treasury conditions, and who had taken a good deal of the burden of the criticism of the administration, had begun to recognize, in his public utterances at least, that all the harm which business felt was overtaking it was not seriously intended. Cognizant, doubtless, of the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury in favor of new forms of internal taxation, the Secretary of Commerce came forward with a statement of the customs revenues which was most alarming. The administration may have "known its ground" on the tariff question, and it may have stood to its guns, but the last horn was about to blow. In a confidential statement to the newspapers, released January 20, Mr. Secretary Redfield, of the Department of Commerce, said:

Decreased customs revenues in the fiscal year 1915 clearly reflect the influence of war.

Ah, when it comes to political economy and the issue between the two great parties, how imposing is the influence of the European war! The European war, it "is but to laugh"! The damage was done before the European war opened. The great loss of employment involving hundreds of thousands; the great loss to business, involving billions of dollars in this country, were all effected before the first shot was fired over yonder in Belgium territory; but the Secretary, like all loyal Democrats, holds to the apology. It is the easiest way out.

LOSSES BEFORE THE WAR.

But the Secretary says:

The influence of war, which operated to cut off imports generally, and especially merchandise from Europe, the leading sources of dutiable goods, and then our cutoms revenues in 1914—

Says the Secretary of Commerce, the efficiency expert of the administration—amounted to $283,700,000, a decrease of $28,700,000, or less than 10 per cent, when compared with 1913. In the following year, under war, they fell to $205,800,000, being $78,700,000, or 27½ per cent below the total for 1914.

Is it any wonder they were disturbed about revenues, with free imports piling up apace? The Secretary was not speaking of imports which came in free, and which have continued throughout the war to compete with American goods and American labor. He was not telling us of the inrush of foreign-made goods despite the war and during the war in foreign countries, that kept flooding our shores, from which no revenue was being derived. He was just telling us of the dead-cold loss in dollars and cents that was resulting from the continued attempt to establish a tariff-for-revenue policy on such goods as did pay and that policy was breaking down. [Applause on the Republican side.]

There was a loss of 10 per cent in revenues in 1913, but the President was not yet scared. He was not yet ready to flop; but in 1914, when the figures were all brought to the front, and it was found that the loss during that year was not 10 per cent, but 27½ per cent in revenues, then the President began to think, and then he began to send for the Democratic leaders, and then he began to talk to the big interests of the country as well as to the little interests and tell them to be still.

CALMING THE TURBULENT SPIRITS.

It was time to stop the storm that was brewing. After the President had told the people that their trouble was only "psychological" he began to tell them to be at ease and peace with the world; that the business interests need give themselves no concern. Even the Attorney General told them that, under the inspiration of the chambers of commerce of the United States. Apparently the great Democratic leader was getting ready to flop; the bare, cold, financial facts were so dead against him that it became necessary to go to the country with some sort of a program and endeavor to explain the situation.

The President is now on his journey; he will tell his story to the people. But wait a minute! Before he left the Capital, and we have the newspaper reports of this morning to prove it, there was a conference of Democratic leaders at the White House. The President sent for the Democratic leader of the House, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], and in consequence of that interview we have the declaration this morning that the new policy upon which the administration is about to embark includes legislation for a tariff commission on lines similar to the Republican tariff commission that was destroyed by the Democratic Party when it came into this House. We are to have a Democratic tariff commission despite the fact that we have a Democratic Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, which was to supply the needs of a tariff board, and totally unmindful of the creation of an expensive Federal Trade Commission, into whose organic law the President, at Indianapolis, indicated there had been slipped a provision giving the administration ample power to make the investigation and reports desired.

ARE THE DEMOCRATS UNITED?

Has the President flopped in making this declaration? And in flopping has he carried the entire Democracy with him? My distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] seems to think that the Democrats will stand unitedly behind the President upon this proposition. Why, Mr. Chairman, we had some evidence of how unitedly they stand together upon any proposition in the discussion of the child-labor bill upon this floor yesterday. We had an evidence of the manner in which they will stand together upon any proposition, when we discussed the good-roads bill for three or four days, and found them beautifully disunited, some for economy and some for expenditure, some for the President and some against.

So, with reference to the tariff commission, we find in the declaration of the leading Democratic paper of the city of Philadelphia, and one of the best in the country, this explanation of the interview between the President of the United States and the Democratic House leader, somewhat reluctant methinks, to discuss the problem with his chief.

THE PANIC (?) OF 1907.

Mr. HOWARD. Will my friend from Pennsylvania yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will yield.

Mr. HOWARD. I hold in my hand a statement from a Republican paper in which it gives the increase of wages of thousands of wage earners in this country from plate glass to cotton mills, a voluntary increase from 5 to 20 per cent. This is the first time I have known of a voluntary raise of wages. Can the gentleman give any reason why these great industrial plants have increased wages when there are such depressed conditions as he speaks of?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Certainly I can. I will not run away from the question put by the gentleman, but before answering him I would like to ask the gentleman if the increase in the lines that he gives with respect to employment and increases of wages, prevailed during the pendency of the Underwood tariff law, from October 13, 1913, until August 1, 1914, when the war broke out in Europe? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HOWARD. In reply to the gentleman, I will say that neither did they exist in 1907 when I saw 30,000 men in Pittsburgh walking the streets begging for bread. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is fine. I expected that some Democrat would applaud, and I see that three did applaud. That panic of 1907 is the only thread that the Democrats have to hang their hats upon, and that was not a tariff panic. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HOWARD. I want to say to my friend in reply——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did not that great trouble start with the Knickerbocker Trust Co. in New York, a financial institution? And have not the Democrats cited it ever since as a tariff panic when as a fact the tariff had absolutely nothing to do with it? Will the gentleman from Georgia answer that, and will the Democrats applaud his answer?

Mr. HOWARD. One thing I can not explain——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know the gentleman can not, and that is the trouble. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

A CONTRAST OF TARIFF CONDITIONS.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield further to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad to yield. I think this is a subject on which the country ought to be enlightened and its memory refreshed. It is the richest morsel that the Democrats ever got hold of although it is entirely apart from the tariff question.

Mr. HOWARD. I am very much interested in what the gentleman from Pennsylvania says, for he is one of the few Representatives who is always pleasant, and because he is always so fair. I would like to ask him if he believes that the Underwood tariff bill was responsible for the conditions in 1914 when it never went into full operation in that year, and does he believe that the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill would have produced any more revenue?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, yes. I will answer the gentleman, and I want the indulgence of the House while I do it. For months prior to the passage of the Underwood bill there was fear and dread throughout the whole length and breadth of the land in all business circles, and particularly where labor was employed.

WHY THERE WAS STAGNATION.

It was believed there would be such a slash in the industries of the country as to practically put them out of business. Men everywhere who had capital invested, who had pay rolls to make good, who had to meet workmen face to face were perturbed; everywhere these men were beginning to retrench, preparing, as it were, for the disaster which they expected to come. And long before the bill was actually enacted into law mills were closing up, men going out of employment, because the new conditions were to be so harsh and unfavorable that ordinary common sense dictated self-preservation of business and fireside. When finally the law was enacted most of the damage had been done. It continued, however, with unabated fury until the expiration of nine months after the passage of the law, when there was a loss of billions in the business in the country. Other countries began to pick up in their industries. They were taking courage out of our misfortunes and our markets were opened to them. I do not exaggerate when I say that workmen began to leave the United States and obtain employment in Canada and Europe, while men at home began to walk the streets.

It is absolutely true, and I am glad the gentleman has given me an opportunity to answer, that our imports were increased. At the same time the exports were falling off at such a rate that it was bringing distress and wretchedness to our farms as well as to our industries, and it was mighty fortunate that the administration, responsible for bringing it about, had the European war to fall back upon when the crash came.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the gentleman yield?

NO PROTECTION FROM DUMPING.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Is it not a fact that millions of dollars worth of goods were dumped on American markets immediately after the passage of the tariff bill, putting a great many factories out of business?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is absolutely true, and although the Democrats had an antidumping clause originally in their bill, they took it out. To-day, however, we hear that along with their proposition to give us a tariff board they propose to restore the antidumping clause to save that situation.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. If that statement of the gentleman is true, why is it that the American products to-day are selling as high as they ever sold in our country?

WHEN PEOPLE STOP BUYING.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Because—and it is well for the gentleman to know this—the war in Europe did not have everything to do with it, as the gentleman thinks. It was by reason of that fear and dread in the industrial world in anticipation and due to the actual operation of the Underwood tariff law that men ceased to manufacture, men ceased to buy; the country merchants did not come to town, the purchasing agents went out of business, and everything ran down to bedrock.

It will be recalled that merchants ran out of stock, mills were not making anything, we were down at the heel, and the time had come when some of the importations from the foreign countries having been checked by reason of the war, we had begun to manufacture again. We had run out and had to start again. The industries picked up, to be sure. But that is not all; the cotton industry in the South got very busy after its panic of 6½ cents, and the people began to discuss manufacturing cotton in the United States, which was encouraged here during the war, when cotton was kept out of Germany, as it was never encouraged by the Democratic Party in normal times. And then, again munitions of war were demanded of the United States, and the industries began making munitions of war; that gave men employment. Good wages were paid, because we got back from Europe a good deal of our money; but I am afraid it is no compliment to the Democratic Party to say that the prosperity that has come from the manufacture of munitions of war is a real or substantial prosperity. That kind of prosperity will go just as soon as the war in Europe closes; it will be all over then; and when it is over God help the United States if we must still operate under the Democratic low-tariff law. [Applause on the Republican side.]

RAISES THE IMMIGRATION QUESTION.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. As I understand the gentleman, of course he is in favor of the importation of foreigners to this country, for he has always voted against any immigration bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have made myself clear on that. I have opposed the literacy test, which is not a test of morality, which is no test of the capacity of a man to work, which is no test of his readiness to labor in the United States for a better position for himself under our laws and Constitution. That is all.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman believes in free trade so far as labor is concerned?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not at all. We have much restrictive immigration law which I approve.

Mr. HOWARD. But a high tariff so far as the products of labor are concerned?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As to the products of foreign labor competing with the products of American labor, yes.

Mr. HOWARD. That is the gentleman's record.

ILLITERACY NOT IMMORAL.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have voted against the literacy test, but when you bring a bill in here that has so many problems involved in it that no one can vote for or against the literacy test without voting the bill up or down I would rather take the safe side of the question and vote against the bill than to punish innocent and deserving human flesh and blood. I have contended that we ought to give the worthy and law-abiding immigrant a chance for his "white alley" in the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Would not the gentleman vote against any bill that would even tend to restrict foreign immigration to this country, no matter of what class?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not necessarily. I would vote for an immigration bill that proposes to keep out anarchists or other trouble makers. But that, as the gentleman knows, is already covered by law. Why, of course, I would vote to keep out the criminal, the unfit, the dissolute——

Mr. HOWARD. But that is the law now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know it is the law, and the new thing in the bill that you have presented to us and ask us to vote for, and which is the matter of difference, puts against the foreigner who is willing to toil and behave as a useful citizen in this country, a bar, because he can not read or write. I say reading is no moral test; it is no test of the worth of a man; the forefathers of many of us possibly came into this country unable to read or write. The question is one of humanity, of conserving human flesh and blood.

A HINT AT ONE TERM.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SLOAN. I trust the gentleman will not close his admirable speech until he says something more on the subject of flopping. We heard the authoritative statement on this floor, for the first time I think, that the next to the last plank of the Baltimore platform should be repealed. This is an announcement in the form of a prediction that the present Executive will succeed himself—a repeal and repudiation of that historic plank. The prediction of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. FLOOD] announcing the most modern flop either of the Executive or the platform itself on the second-term proposition must be authoritative. It should find a place in the gentleman's speech.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman, as I observed a moment ago, not intending to interrupt him in the course of his question, is a mind reader, for he knows exactly what I was about to say.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Has the gentleman forgotten the emphatic declaration contained in a letter to Col. Evans, in Philadelphia, by the President of the United States as to the sufficiency of the trade commission?

THOUGHT TRADE COMMISSION SUFFICIENT.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The President of the United States did write a letter to Mr. Evans, of Philadelphia, expressing entire confidence in the sufficiency of the tariff clauses of the trade commission bill; but of course this was before the flop of the day before yesterday.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will ask the gentleman if he will be good enough to read section 3 of the bill which I introduced early in December, it being the bill which in 1913 passed both Houses of Congress, with a solid Republican vote, to provide for a tariff commission. If he will read section 3, which provides for the duties of that board, he will see whether there is any difference whatever between that and what the President of the United States recommends to-day in his letter to Mr. KITCHIN.

LIKE THE LONGWORTH BILL.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think, without reading it carefully, because I do not want to consume the time, that everything contained in this paragraph is contained in the President's newest suggestion. The President is a schoolmaster, as he stated in his Indianapolis speech, and it is just possible that he or some of his friends may have seen this Republican provision before they made their Democratic suggestion.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think it will be worth while for the gentleman to read that section into his speech. It is short.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Very well, I will take the gentleman's word for it. This is a bill introduced by Mr. LONGWORTH on December 6, 1915, being H. R. 154, to create a tariff commission. Section 3 reads as follows:

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of said commission to investigate the cost of production of all articles which by any act of Congress now in force or hereafter enacted are made the subject of tariff legislation, with special reference to the prices paid domestic and foreign labor and the prices paid for raw materials, whether domestic or imported, entering into manufactured articles, producers' prices and retail prices of commodities, whether domestic or imported, the condition of domestic and foreign markets affecting the American products, including detailed information with respect thereto, together with all other facts which may be necessary or convenient in fixing import duties or in aiding the President and other officers of the Government in the administration of the custom laws, and said commission shall also make investigation of any such subject whenever directed by either House of Congress.

In commenting on that, I want to say that while this bill is the work of Mr. LONGWORTH, my colleague from Ohio, it has an extremely familiar sound, and since the utterance from the White House as published to-day sounds just as deep-dyed Republican as it does Democratic, showing how great minds work along, after all, in the same groove.

ABANDONED, NOT FLOPPED.

I was saying a moment ago when interrupted by some one that there was a grave question of doubt as to whether the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] was accurate in his statement that all the Democrats would stand behind the President, and that as a result of his tour of the country it would be found that with one voice they would rise up and demand the reelection of Mr. Wilson.

The Democratic Philadelphia Record, from which I started to quote, the leading exponent of its party in the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, a hornet in the side of Republicans, and which has a very bright man obtaining its news from the White House and sending it over to Philadelphia every day, has this to say with respect to this phase of Democratic unity:

In proposing the creation of an independent board to investigate customs methods and tariff needs and report its recommendations to Congress along the lines described on December 8—

It does not say "flopped"—

the President has abandoned the project most favored by him for the present project.

CHANGING BY DEGREES.

Now, the President was once for one project, but he has "abandoned" that project, and now he is for another project; but it is explained without using the word the gentleman from Texas unfortunately threw into this discussion a little while ago—the offensive word "flopped"—that—

He was then of the opinion that the tariff could be divorced from political influences by expanding the powers of the Foreign and Domestic Trade Bureau of the Department of Commerce.

That is when he held the other view—the view entertained at the time he made the Indianapolis speech.

This plan—

Says the Record—was favored at the time by Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo and Secretary Redfield, who, in common with a number of the President's other advisers, opposed the suggestion to confer the necessary powers to initiate tariff revision upon the Federal Trade Commission.

COMMISSION DID NOT MEASURE UP.

Apparently there were three steps in this transaction: First, the abolition of the Republican Tariff Board; second, the creation of the Democratic Interstate and Foreign Commerce Bureau; and then a Democratic Federal Trades Commission. But the writer continues:

This commission, according to Democratic leaders, has not fulfilled the expectations that prompted its creation.

This is the one, as the President observed at Indianapolis, he put over on us. Now, it does not appear to be satisfactory. Something further is needed:

The new plan will segregate the tariff in the proposed board. In this way it is the belief of the President—

Perhaps this method is a little more "psychological"; may be a little more efficient. If we could "segregate" the tariff from Congress through the proposed board, we might get another start and fool the people a third or fourth time. "Segregation" might then take the place so lately occupied by "psychological." The new plan will segregate the tariff in the proposed board. Says the writer:

In this way, it is the belief of the President, his aim to perfect the Underwood tariff law purely upon the basis of merit, and not because of political influences, can be best accomplished.

"PERFECTING" THE LOW-TARIFF LAW.

Note the language, "perfect the Underwood tariff law," as if from the Democratic viewpoint that law is not already perfect. But do not stop with "perfecting" the law. Bear in mind that this new tariff board which is to aid in perfecting the law is to be devoid of political influence. We are to have a tariff board appointed by a Democratic President, which is to deal with the tariff on merit and without regard to politics. That is at least helpful.

Now, here is something that I almost hesitate to read, although I think it ought to be read here, so the House can understand the inappropriateness of the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia that all Democrats will stand together. It says:

Leader KITCHIN did not subscribe to this view—

That is to say, this segregation view—

during his talk with the President regarding it this morning.

This disclosure violates no rule of the House, because it is published in a newspaper, and I have a right to read it in my time.

Leader KITCHIN did not subscribe to this view during his talk with the President regarding it this morning—

Evidently the gentleman from North Carolina, who is now upon the floor, did not want to go into the segregation business so far as it affected the tariff. That is the statement of our distinguished friend from North Carolina as it is given here, and he, of course, may answer this in his own time if he so sees fit.

In fact, he asked to be relieved from the management of the measure on the ground that he had always opposed—

A SLIGHT DIFFERENCE BETWEEN LEADERS.

That is to say, it is now the second or third proposition that the President had after he had enunciated his suggestion that they knew where they stood and the platform was not made to "catch flies."

And Mr. KITCHIN asked to be relieved from the management of the measure on the ground that he had always opposed such a proposition.

He was consistent. The gentleman from North Carolina apparently did not "flop" on the question, and frankly told the President so.

That he had always opposed such a proposition in the past and had led the fight against President Taft's recommendation for such an institution in 1908.

There you have it. There is the position of one great leader on the Democratic side and another great leader on the Democratic side; one willing to flop and change several times and the other endeavoring to be consistent and stand his ground so that he might not be accused of being "molasses with which to catch flies." [Applause on the Republican side.]

But listen to this:

As a way out of this difficulty he suggested to the President that Congressman HENRY T. RAINEY, of Illinois, who is the next ranking member of the Ways and Means Committee, be given charge of the legislation.

ILLINOIS SUPPLIES THE CHAMPION.

Now, there it is. Everyone who knows the amiable gentleman from Illinois knows that he is a determined advocate of the policy of tariff for revenue only; that he dislikes protection and a tariff in general, though he has made himself a master of the subject. And what does Mr. RAINEY do? According to this report, after it has been suggested that Mr. RAINEY should relieve Mr. KITCHIN of the arduous task which the President was trying to impose upon the gentleman from North Carolina, this paper says:

The President assented and will have a talk with the Illinois Congressman in a day or so.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

And then we have it straight from the shoulder—

RAINEY this afternoon indicated his readiness to undertake the commission.

So now, in the course of these rather desultory remarks upon a rather dry subject, we find that the leader of the Democracy in the House, our distinguished and eloquent friend from North Carolina, will not follow the President in the "about-face" movement with respect to a tariff board, but that gently but firmly he unloads upon the distinguished and forceful gentleman from Illinois, who, at the behest of the President, will take up the task. The Lord be with him! [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

DO THOSE WHO FLOP LEAD?

In conclusion, gentlemen, with respect to the suggestions thrown out by my friend from Texas [Mr. DIES], who continues to preside with grace and dignity over the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I think it is fair to say that "he who flops will not always lead." [Applause on the Republican side.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, flopping is not new on the other side of the House. For instance, there was the flop on the plank written into the Democratic platform of Baltimore promising free tolls to American ships through the American-paid-for canal. That was a plank put there to stay until the day of judgment. It was not "molasses with which to catch flies." But we saw in due course that our Democratic friends came in with pallor on their faces, indicating that the President, after minute study of the international problems involved, had induced them, for the safety and preservation of the Nation, as they saw it, to vote against their own platform and charge Americans just as much as they charge any foreigners for using their own canal. And they did that to us good and hard. Then came the suggestion from the Democratic convention at Baltimore that the extravagance of a Republican Congress should be abolished and that Democratic simplicity of expenditure should prevail; and it came shortly thereafter out of the mouths of the Democratic leaders themselves, raising their hands to high heaven in expostulation against the aggrandizement of their own Members, unable to check their wild horses seeking appropriations, that their Congress had been the most extravagant in the history of the Nation, and there never had been anything like unto it during the administration of the Republican Party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

THE CONSISTENCY OF DEMOCRATS.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Does not the gentleman know that universal consistency is the sole virtue of idiots?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think that is the trouble with the Democratic Party. It is too infernally consistent on some questions and too inconsistent on others.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is in favor of a nonpartisan tariff commission?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If you can find a nonpartisan tariff commission, I am in favor of it. [Applause.]

Mr. LENROOT. One other question——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think I can quote the Speaker of this House——

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask one other question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Six minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

RESERVING THE RIGHTS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is in favor of that kind of a tariff commission that the Republican side of this House has stood for in the past?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to a tariff board that ascertains the facts and gives both the President and Congress such information as will enable them to properly adjust the tariff rates. I hope that answers the gentleman.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like an answer to my question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have answered the gentleman. The gentleman may differ as to the meaning of the term "board" or the term "commission." From my point of view there is very little difference between the two terms. As interpreted by the Republicans heretofore and the Democrats now, there is absolutely no difference. They propose, under the Constitution, to ascertain the facts and report to Congress, and let Congress attend to its business of fixing the rates.

Mr. LENROOT. I was in good faith——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know it.

IS A TARIFF BOARD NONPARTISAN?

Mr. LENROOT. I want to know the gentleman's position—whether he is in favor of the kind of legislation, with reference to a tariff commission or tariff board—it is immaterial which you call it—that the Republican side of this House has stood for and voted for?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I say to the gentleman this, that I am in favor of any kind of a board or commission that will ascertain the facts and send to the House the information that it is necessary for the House to have in order to exercise its constitutional duty of fixing the rates equitably.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly. That answers my question.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to ask the gentleman if a law should be passed by which a tariff commission should be appointed, and it should be appointed by President Wilson, do you believe that our present tariff law would be very materially changed?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I scarcely think so, if it is what some gentlemen think it will be—a partisan commission, because it would be impossible for the President of the United States to appoint an impartial tariff board. It is not the history of the President of the United States that he has ever deviated from his party line. In every instance where he has appointed commissions—these expense-eating commissions, these revenue-burning commissions of recent date—he has appointed Democrats, and some of them have had trouble in finding something to do.

DEMOCRATIC APPROVAL OF REPUBLICAN BOARD.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have only a few minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move that the gentleman have five minutes additional time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania have five minutes additional time. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Now, will the gentleman permit me to read at this point, as I think it will be apropos here, an opinion by a very prominent Democrat of the Republican Tariff Board and its work?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will keep within the five minutes.

WHEN THE CHEMICAL SCHEDULE WAS UP.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is very brief. In a speech which the gentleman, who is now Governor General of the Philippine Islands, made in this House—I refer to the Hon. Burton Harrison—on the 19th of February, 1912, being in charge of the chemical schedule of the Underwood tariff, he said:

> But more than this, and in addition, the Democratic membership of the Committee on Ways and Means in the preparation of this bill has had the benefit of the report of the Tariff Board on Schedule A. [Applause.]
> The report of the Tariff Board consists of a glossary of the paragraphs of the existing law and, in addition, an economic review of the chemical industry in the United States, in Canada, in France, in England, and in Germany.' The members of the Ways and Means Committee take this opportunity of expressing to the Tariff Board their appreciation of the very valuable assistance which this report has been to them in the preparation of their bill.

That is a strong Democratic indorsement of the work of the Republican Tariff Board which they, however, saw fit to abolish for purely partisan reasons.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman from Wisconsin for reminding the House of that very interesting statement.

GATHERING THE FACTS FOR CONGRESS.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HILL. I will remind the gentleman that that is but an informal opinion of one member of the committee, but if the gentleman will examine the report on the Underwood bill I think he will find a distinct repudiation of all those statements in the action taken on the part of the Senate and on the part of the House, that they did not utilize that information in making up the tariff law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think, however, that does not affect the statement read by the gentleman from Wisconsin, which places on record the thoughts that were uppermost in the minds of the chairmen of some of the subcommittees of the Committee on Ways and Means bringing the tariff bill into the House; that without the information presented by the Republican Tariff Board they would have been at sea in fixing the various schedules.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit another interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. They brought in, in two consecutive years, two chemical schedules, one of them purely ad valorem and the other its opposite in principle, based upon specific duties.

GOOD WORK OF REPUBLICAN POLICIES.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes, Mr. Chairman; another flop. The gentleman from Wisconsin is clear and he is right. Not only did they bring in two bills on the chemical schedule, but they also brought in various bills on various other schedules, testing out and experimenting with the prosperity of the United States. And if any Democrat finds fault to-day with any of us for reminding them of those things, let it be said in the interest of the people of the United States that, having brought them up under a Republican system of protection as to tariff rates, which imposed the burden of taxation upon the foreign manufacturers of competing commodities, and having brought the country into a condition of happiness and domestic felicity such as it had never known before, we rightfully resent the intrusion upon that prosperity the experimentation of schoolmasters and others who, by reason of their undermining legislative practices, dragged it down and put the country for a time in the very lowest depths of industrial despair. [Applause on the Republican side.]

FINE ASSORTMENT OF FLOPS.

Now, as to this matter of the text furnished by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], who presides over the committee, we have observed that there was a flop on the Panama Canal question. We have also observed that there was a flop on the question of extravagance, and we all know there was a complete flop and breach of promise in the matter of the reduction of the high cost of living, because the cost of living has gone up and soared higher and higher since the Democrats have been in power.

There was also a breaking of the promise to the people that the Democratic Party would relieve them of the burden of taxation, because instead of taking off the burden of taxation they have put on additional burdens, large and small, on the people as individuals and otherwise, and they have put upon business such a system of inquisition and such a system of commission government as was never known before. They have piled up war taxes and stamp taxes such as would not have been tolerated under a Republican system. They have flopped upon every pledge that they made in the platform adopted at Baltimore—sugar, the trusts, the tariff, and all—because their policies, social, domestic, economic, and financial, were wrong. The effect of their failure has proven the absolute righteousness of the Republican system of protection and of the Republican system of building up and sustaining the industries of the country.

THE SINGLE-TERM PLANK.

But in still another platform plank have they made a breach; on another plank has the distinguished Democratic President and party leader made a flop. It was not made when his letter of acceptance of the Democratic national nomination and platform was written. It was not made known until a few weeks ago, when the political situation became so acute that the public had to be informed whether the President of the United States would again be a candidate for office or not.

Democracy knows, Republicanism knows, every man who reads the newspapers knows, and certainly everyone who reads the Commoner knows that the one-term plank put into the Democratic national platform was not "molasses intended to catch flies." That plank meant business. There was a gentleman out in Nebraska who wrote that platform with malice aforethought. [Laughter.] The President knew what that political plank was. There was a suggestion, formerly made, that some one out in Nebraska was to be "knocked into a cocked hat," but instead of being "knocked into a cocked hat," he was taken into camp as a member of the Cabinet. But he did not stay in long; the one-term plank was burning a hole in his ambition, and he wanted to come out and talk to the people about it; he is now endeavoring to convince the people of the country that the one-term plank was right.

DISAPPOINTING MR. BRYAN.

But the Democratic President was not in accord with the gentleman from Nebraska on the one-term idea. He said little about it, but a long time ago he wrote to a distinguished Democrat and former Congressman in this House, Mr. A. Mitchell Palmer, his views on the one-term situation. He thought the people should determine such a question as Mr. Bryan wrote into the Baltimore platform. Why did we not get that letter a year ago? Why was it kept in Mr. Palmer's pocket from that time down until this? Why did not the President authorize Mr. Palmer to publish that letter so that the country might have a clean-cut understanding of his position? Perhaps some Democrat will tell us. We got the letter only a couple of weeks ago. In that letter we find discussed certain matters of public policy and political insight which induced the President, having served one term, to leave it up to the people as to whether he shall be elected a second term.

PRESIDENT DID NOT PLEDGE.

Here is the last breach in the Democratic platform. We can not blame the President for it, because in no published word can we find any acceptance by him of the suggestion that the one-term plank met with his approval. The Commoner lost no opportunity to let the country know where it stood upon this important matter both before and after the Baltimore convention. It had small regard for the man who would run upon a platform and not abide by its terms. But Mr. Wilson, the Democratic nominee, was not baited. His letter of acceptance might be scanned from start to finish without revealing a thought or line upon the plank that laid so close to the heart of the Commoner's distinguished editor. The letter to Mr. Palmer, the publication of which was long deferred, was the first inkling of the President's disbelief in the amiable thought of his erstwhile Secretary of State. It was the last "flop," not so much on the part of the President as on the part of those devoted followers of Mr. Bryan, who have been persuaded that the Democratic platform was in error when it sought to limit the tenure of a President to a single term.

WHEN REPUBLICANS COME BACK.

And now, Mr. Chairman, accepting the text of the eloquent gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], let me suggest to our friends on the other side that they may continue to "flop" among themselves to their hearts' content. Upon this side we are standing pat upon the Republican doctrine of protection and prosperity to the Nation, which we hope to restore when a consistent Republican administration again takes up the reins of office. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. RAINEY rose and was recognized.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I want to speak only five or ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that he recognized the gentleman from Illinois before the gentleman from Wisconsin indicated his desire to speak.

Mr. RAINEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I am a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, entitled to the floor in my own right, but I do not care to exercise that right now.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I can understand the difficulties under which a standpat Republican like the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] labors in his attempt, even in an hour and five minutes, to discredit the President of the United States. And I want to say to the gentleman, who is an expert along that line, that he can throw as much mud at the President as he pleases; it will have no more effect upon the President and upon his policies, and upon the things he stands for in this country and before the world than the gentleman could accomplish by throwing mud at the Washington Monument. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Speaking of flopping, I wonder if the gentleman from Pennsylvania is going to flop? I wonder if gentlemen on that side are going to flop? Let me read from the campaign platform adopted by the last national Republican convention, upon which gentlemen on that side of the aisle were elected and upon which they have been pretending to stand:

> The pronounced feature of modern industrial life is its enormous diversification. To apply tariff rates justly to these changing conditions requires closer study and more scientific methods than ever before. The Republican Party has shown by its creation of a tariff board its recognition of this situation and its determination to be equal to it. We condemn the Democratic Party for its failure either to provide funds for the continuance of this board or to make some other provision for securing the information requisite for intelligent tariff legislation. We protest against the Democratic method of legislating on these vitally important subjects without careful investigation.

Now, that is the Republican position. That is the platform you will all stand on if you do not flop when this matter is presented to you soon. I understand from the position taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] that he objects to the creation now of a nonpartisan tariff board, for the reason that the Democrats are in control, and for that reason it can not be nonpartisan; and then he proceeds to show that upon this question Democratic leaders are not united. He proceeds to prove that our proposition is not partisan.

I want to say concerning the report made by our distinguished former colleague in this House, Mr. Harrison, of New York, now Governor General of the Philippine Islands, that those bills which formed the nucleus of the Underwood tariff bill, and which were framed in the Sixty-second Congress, were all based on the reports of President Taft's tariff board, and we sent some of those bills clear on up to President Taft, and demonstrating this lack of consistency in the Republican Party, he vetoed them. Yet every one of them could be defended by simply calling attention to the collection of facts and data appearing in the reports of that special tariff board.

Now, I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] that I know the kind of a tariff commission he wants. He does not propose to stand on this Republican national platform. He proposes to stand upon the platform recently announced by his leader, the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, who in his speech before the New England Club, of Providence, R. I., on the 16th day of October, 1915, defined his position, and speaking for the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. MOORE], evidently also defined his position. He said:

> First get back a protective tariff, and then select a permanent tariff commission.

That is the platform upon which Republican partisans upon that side, blinded by partisanship, stand in this economic crisis of our history as a Nation. That is the kind of a nonpartisan tariff commission they want now.

Here is the way some of the rest of these distinguished Republican leaders and certain Republican journals now stand. Every one of them flops from this platform declaration of theirs which I have just read, and here is the kind of a platform they stand on now. Here is an expression from the Manufacturers' News, last October:

> The tariff commission idea has whiskers. Political pressure would rule. The tariff can not be taken out of politics. The proposed commission would delay for two years a tariff revision.

Here is what the Hartford (Conn.) Courant said in September, 1915:

> It would be difficult to have a nonpartisan tariff commission. A tariff commission works in Germany because there is no dispute as to the protection principle there.

Here is the kind of a platform to which they have flopped from the national Republican platform of two years ago, as expressed by the Muncie (Ind.) National Republican:

> If the tariff is taken out of politics, it will be when free traders cease firing on the American policy. We favor a tariff commission when there has been a prompt upward revision of the tariff after the inauguration of another protectionist President.

Here is what the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] said recently in the American Economist of August 20, 1915. This is how he has flopped from the nonpartisan tariff-commission expressions of his Republican platform:

> I am not in favor of such a commission as would be appointed by the free trader now in the White House.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUTCHINSON] about the same time, in fact in the same issue of the American Economist, said:

> The people want the Republican Party to revise the tariff. There are too many commissions.

Here is what the distinguished Senator from Washington, Senator JONES, said on August 13, 1915:

> I am in favor of a commission to revise the tariff on a protective standard.

Here is what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], who has just taken his seat, said on the 6th day of August, 1915, in the American Economist:

The question can not be answered until we find whether a non-partisan tariff commission is possible.

Here is what the American Economist said in July, 1915:

The tariff-commission idea is a fallacy. It is all right in Germany, because the policy of protection prevails there—

And so on.

That is the platform upon which Republicans stand now who are blinded by partisanship. That is how they have flopped from their own platform, adopted in their national convention at Chicago.

You can depend upon the President of the United States and upon the Democratic Party to stand always patriotically for the best interests of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Does the gentleman who has just taken his seat realize the changed conditions which confront us now, the changed world conditions? Why, the Underwood tariff law had just commenced to work, it was yielding as much and more revenue than we expected it to yield, but suddenly there was a red glow in the eastern skies, and from out of the clouds of war a hand of iron reached and stopped the ships upon the seas, the ships that were bringing goods to our ports, the goods that were to pay the revenue under the Underwood tariff bill. Can the gentleman from Pennsylvania with all of his shrewd partisanship and unfair logic convince the country that the United States is responsible in any measure for that war? Talk as much as you may about the blood-streaked prosperity on this side of the water, who is responsible for prosperity of that kind? Talk about manufacturing munitions here in private plants, and shipping them across the seas to be used for the purpose of dealing out death on the battlefields of Europe, who is responsible for that? Why, the party which was in power for so many years and refused to build up Government munition factories in this country. That party is responsible for the trade in arms which is now possible. They can not charge us with that sort of business. Are men being killed on European battlefields by guns manufactured in America? Who made that possible? Why, the party that was in power when that business was built up throughout the country and which refused to establish Government plants for the manufacture of arms. That party must answer for it now and when the question is presented to the electorate next November.

Now, speaking of prosperity, I want to read from Republican journals something about what is going on in this country at the present time. I read from the Washington Post of October 25, always against the administration and always speaking for the Republican Party:

[From the Washington Post, Oct. 25.]

A WEEK OF IMMENSE TRANSACTIONS IN BUSINESS.

The week that has just closed has been a week of sensational advances in many stocks of industrial companies.

* * * * * * *

Among the large orders placed in this country during the past week may be mentioned one for railroad ties to the value of $2,500,000.

* * * * * * *

The report of the General Chemical Co. for the quarter ended September 30 is an exhibit well up in the line with the prosperity reports of many big business concerns.

The net profits for the quarter were $1,705,273, an increase over the preceding quarter of $945,352.

During the nine months since January 1, 1915, the profits were $4,058,741, an increase of $1,872,734 as compared with the first nine months of 1914.

* * * * * * *

Exports of wheat from United States and Canadian ports during the past week broke all records, totaling 11,113,093 bushels.

For the 16 weeks ended October 21 corn exports were 3,426,689 bushels, as against but 1,861,040 bushels in the same period of last year.

Recently in the Chicago Drovers' Journal J. Ogden Armour, a better authority than the gentleman from Pennsylvania—and the gentleman will admit it himself—on commercial matters, on the question of prosperity in this country, gave out this authorized interview on the 11th of November, 1915. I read this interview in full:

UNITED STATES IN RECORD BOOM ERA, SAYS ARMOUR—AMERICA RISING RAPIDLY TO UNPRECEDENTED PROSPERITY, INCONCEIVABLE A YEAR AGO AND ENDURING, SAYS PACKER.

[From the Drovers Journal, Nov. 11, 1915.]

J. Ogden Armour, in an interview on crop, market, and financial conditions, said: "America is rapidly rising to an unprecedented prosperity, a prosperity which would have been inconceivable a year ago, and which will be enduring. It will be boomlike for, say, three years, and should not be affected by a termination of the European war within that time."

For a captain of industry, whose reticence, restraint, and conservatism are proverbial, the above declaration is interesting and instructive.

"The idea that the cessation of European hostilities must affect us adversely is, I believe, academic," said Mr. Armour. "In the first place, emigration from the countries now at war will be prohibited. They will be forced to take this step because the conflict means an exhaustion of men as well as of treasure. Men will be needed over there as much, if not more, than money. There can be no competition between a country of America's great vigor and infinite resources and countries that have spent themselves.

AMERICA TO LEAD.

"America was destined to lead the world commercially and financially in 15 years. The war simply hastened that manifest destiny. For an American to fear the aftermath of the war appears to me baseless."

The president of Armour & Co. then proceeded to give reasons for his unshakable optimism:

"Ours is not a war prosperity, although, to be sure, ammunition orders are accelerating the pace," he said. "It is fundamental, in that the products of the farm are the basis of it. We are still largely an agricultural community, and as agriculture prospers the whole country prospers.

"Look at our crops and the prices we are getting for them. Both have no parallel in the country's annals. Wheat was late in harvesting, but is now coming abundantly to market. The enormous daily exports show that the corn yield is bountiful. The run of hogs will be large.

EUROPE BUYING HEAVILY.

"The demand for these necessaries is in proportion to their supply. Europe is buying as she has never bought before, and the swelling bank deposits reflect the heavy European payments as well as the affluence of the farmer.

"Take, for example, the National City Bank of New York" (of which Mr. Armour is a director). "A year ago the gross deposits of that institution were $245,000,000. To-day they are more than $500,000,000." (The shares of the institution have risen 150 points.)

"Bankers as a rule have been hard put by these startling increases. Rates are low, but the money will all be profitably employed. It is only a question of time, and the employment of so much money will mean just so much more prosperity.

"The South, which only a few months ago was in despair, is now, to speak colloquially, drunk with prosperity. Planters are finding no difficulty in marketing their cotton at good prices. That section of the country is fortunate, too, in enjoying a revival in the lumber trade. Timber in the South has advanced $2 a thousand.

"I have no doubt that the Pacific coast, whose timber trade has been lagging, will soon thrive. In fact, every leading industry is flourishing or beginning to flourish. Building permits throughout the country are at a high mark. So it is with what might be called the luxurious or semiluxurious lines, such as jewelry and furniture. Our reports from Grand Rapids, the furniture manufacturing center, show that the factories are operating at full capacity."

RAILROADS ARE BAROMETERS.

It may be noted here in parentheses that the Armour organizations have unusual facilities for obtaining widespread and accurate statistics on current commercial conditions. The packing company, for example, has an agent in every city of consequence, while Mr. Armour himself is a director in several banks and in the Illinois Central and the St. Paul Railway system.

"Then," continued Mr. Armour, "there are the railway revenues. These are infallible indicators of trade tendencies. Earnings are increasing by leaps and bounds. There is a car shortage for the first time in five years. I know of western roads which could use double the cars they have at their disposal at present. In brief, we—the United States—are 'it' with a capital 'I' and will continue to be in that enviable position indefinitely."

From Dun's Weekly Review of Trade for the week ending November 12, which ought to be as good authority as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has just taken his seat, I read:

WEEKLY REVIEW OF TRADE.

NO SLACKENING IN SIGNS FORECASTING GREATEST COMMERCIAL DEVELOPMENT IN HISTORY, SAYS DUN—MILD WEATHER RETARDING RETAIL BUYING, BRADSTREET REPORTS.

NEW YORK, November 12.

R. G. Dun's weekly review of trade to-morrow will say:

There is no slackening of the advance that foreshadows the greatest commercial development in the history of the country.

Following many months of gradual recovery and adjustment to new conditions, progress has come with such a rush that reaction is feared in some quarters; yet the economic position steadily gains in strength, and seldom, if ever, has the situation so favored continued expansion.

Business is no longer wholly dependent upon the war demands, the bumper crops, the widespread increase in production, in the working force and in the power of the people to purchase having established the basis for an era of unexampled prosperity.

There is, moreover, the further and highly significant increase of abundant supplies of money for all legitimate purposes while the arrangements for supplementary foreign credits augur well for the maintenance of the phenomenal movements in over-sea commerce.

The figures of merchandise exports, pig-iron output, bank clearings, and railroad earnings bring to light achievements without precedent, and to the list of remarkable attainments have been added those of unfilled steel tonnage and commodity prices.

* * * * * * *

The lumber trade improvement, first visible at the South, has reached the Pacific Northwest, where prices have been advanced; winter wheat marketing is freer, thus improving collections, and sales of spring wheat are large, despite holding by farmers; demand for coal is better, activity in steam grades testifying to enlarged industrial operations; railway transportation is of record proportions, the margin of idle cars has about disappeared, and shortages loom up as the railways strain to move the freight offering overcrowded rails and through congested terminals.

As to what is being accomplished in the matter of good times and prosperity under Democratic rule I might read now extracts from an Associated Press article sent out over the country on November 27:

NEW YORK, November 27.

The Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad, whose lines are choken as far back as Scranton with loaded freight cars it can not move, to-day notified its agents to accept no more freight for export until further notice.

More than 6,000 cars from the West, loaded with grain, feed, flour, copper, and hundreds of other commodities, have virtually turned the terminals of the road into a storage warehouse for weeks. Some of the cars have been here for 80 days.

Nearly every road terminal entering here is glutted with loaded freight cars standing idle on sidings for hundreds of miles back along the line, and it was stated that other roads would follow the Lackawanna's lead shortly.

* * * * * * *

I now read from an article in the Washington Times of a recent issue:

* * * * * * *

A gain of $445,241,906 was made during the 10 months in the total value of exports of breadstuffs, cottonseed oil, cattle, hogs, sheep, meat, and dairy products, cotton, and mineral oils. Up to November of the present year these exports totaled $1,145,240,826, as against $699,998,920 for the first 10 months of last year.

More than $87,625,000 of the gain this year was made by cotton, the exports being valued at $349,975,904, as against $262,349,975 last year. A total of 3,796,856,462 pounds, or 7,276,280 bales, of cotton have been shipped abroad thus far this year.

Among the big export items were 420,451,068 pounds of bacon, valued at $55,683,943; 714,496,902 gallons of illuminating oil, worth $42,385,934; 250,962,514 bushels of wheat, worth $12,448,746; and 218,168,774 pounds of fresh beef, worth $38,073,197.

For October of this year the exports of foods, cotton, and oil showed a gain of $26,906,869 over the corresponding month last year, the figures being $110,615,275 for the tenth month of this year and $83,709,406 for last year.

I read from the Washington Herald of November 14, 1915:

[Washington Herald, Nov. 14, 1915.]

BROAD EXPANSION OF BUSINESS ACTIVITY ALL OVER COUNTRY.

The outstanding feature of the business situation in October has been the fact that all trade has been unmistakably better. We expressed the opinion two months ago, says the November bulletin of the National City Bank of New York, that as the season for fall trade came on, the country would swing into a broad, general state of activity, and that expectation has been realized. Every part of the country now sends good reports, and the contrast they make with the conditions of a year ago is calculated to inspire the most profound sentiments of relief, satisfaction, and gratitude.

* * * * * * *

The woolgrowers have sold this year's clip at record prices, and the live-stock interests are exceptionally prosperous. Farm seekers from other States are pouring into the States of the Northwest, where a limited amount of comparatively cheap lands are still to be had.

The metal mining industry of the West, which was badly crippled a year ago, is now in full swing. There is enormous activity in the production of copper, lead, and zinc; it is now up to capacity of the mines and smelters, and in the case of zinc the smelter capacity is being materially increased. So far as agriculture, stock raising, and mining go the West is exceedingly prosperous.

* * * * * * *

The available supply of labor is so fully employed that the situation is on the verge of being critical. Food supplies promise to be abundant and moderate in price for the coming year, and the outlook for general comfort and prosperity in the United States is at present very promising.

Here is an Associated Press dispatch from Washington:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 13.

Uncle Sam's coffers were swelled during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1915, by the collection of $415,681,023 by the internal-revenue bureau, according to the annual report of Commissioner W. H. Osborn to Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo. The collection was the greatest in the history of the bureau.

If you will examine closely the reports issued from this office you will find that this increase in collections is due not only to the unexampled prosperity which prevails in this country under Democratic rule, but to the fact that this office is equipped now to collect these revenues, and is collecting them. There have been no scandals in the transaction of any of the business of the Treasury Department in collecting internal revenues or revenues on imports at our ports. There have been no stories of bribing of little fifteen-dollar and twenty-dollar a week Government checkers and weighers or manipulation of scales on Government wharves by which great institutions under a Republican administration were able to steal from the Treasury of the United States millions and millions of dollars. We have conducted these various departments of this Government honestly, and we are collecting the moneys that are coming to this Government from these various sources; and that is one reason for this increase in collections reported from this department of the Government charged with making them. These favorable reports as to trade expansion which will be permanent, according to these Republican authorities, all of them worthy of more consideration than these gentlemen who make partisan speeches on that side of the House, continue until the present time, and they will continue indefinitely in the future.

You declared in your platform that you are in favor of a tariff board or a tariff commission, I do not care what you call it, to apply tariff rates to changing conditions. In the history of this country and of the world were economic conditions ever changing more rapidly than they are now? Germany is our great competitor for the world's markets. As a member of the committee and one of the conferees which had in charge the drafting of the Underwood tariff bill, I want to say, and even gentlemen on that side will agree with me, that the Underwood tariff bill was framed with reference to possible German competition in the future. Germany was our real competitor for the markets of the world, and Germany will continue to be when this war is over our real competitor for the world's markets. You are in favor of a tariff commission, you say, if it can be a Republican tariff commission. You are in favor of a tariff commission modeled upon the German plan, because there you say they are committed to the doctrine of protection. Do you know that they are about to abandon the doctrine of protection over there?

Is it possible the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has not been reading the inspired articles which find their way into our press, copied from journals faithfully representing the ideas of the government in Germany, in which the information is given out that at the end of the war they propose to take off their tariff on foodstuffs entirely? They propose to put foodstuffs on the free list, and they have gone so far as to declare that they propose to put the necessaries of life on the free list. What they propose to do with the other things they have not yet announced, but we know, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] knows, how they revise tariffs over there in Germany. Find fault with us for discontinuing the activities of the tariff board, and then say that we want the kind of a tariff board that is possible over there in Germany! Why, when they get through with a revision of the tariff in Germany they discharge their tariff board from further activities. They have a tariff board there composed of 30 men, 15 of them selected by representatives of certain industries and 15 of them selected by the representatives of the German Emperor and confirmed by their legislative body. After they revised their tariff in 1902—and that is the last German revision—they, in protection Germany, discharged their board. That is what we did here, and nothing else. We followed the kind of program you say you stand for and shut off the activities of this tariff board when we had put upon the books the greatest tariff law ever constructed in this country up until that time [applause on the Democratic side], a tariff law which had already compelled the great Arlington Mills over there in Massachusetts to announce that its next delivery of worsteds would be placed on the market at a reduction of 25 per cent, and all over the country announcements of reductions in wholesale prices were being made when this war broke out.

We have only done in our manipulation of the tariff question exactly what you say ought to be done, for we have followed the German practice. But the German tariff law enacted in 1902 was preliminary to her treaties, and her commercial treaties with all the commercial nations of the world expire this present year. As soon as this war is over, of course, the German tariff will be revised. It must be revised in order to meet the new treaties which they propose to make. According to your own provision contained in your own platform, has not the time come now when there are changing conditions, conditions which require the activities of a tariff board, conditions which require that a nonpartisan tariff board be appointed for the purpose of keeping pace with the approaching German tariff revision, for the purpose of keeping pace and being in a position to inform the Congress, with facts and data as to the changing conditions the world over, which everyone knows this war is going to bring about? We are going to give you an opportunity, all of you on that side, to stand on your own platform, or an opportunity to flop from your platform, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and his distinguished leader, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], have already done. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

THE WAR AND THE TARIFF.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. ROGERS. I desired to be recognized in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for one hour.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, the first half of the legislative history of the Wilson administration ended when the Sixty-third Congress, the 4th of March last, adjourned sine die. The second half began when the Sixty-fourth Congress convened last month.

We have passed the halfway mark. The moment seems opportune for a review of the record of the administration upon its legislative side. Such a review can, of course, not be even attempted in a single speech, and in my remarks to-day I shall confine myself, in the main, to an analysis of the fiscal policy and accomplishment of the last two years.

Three dates stand out as crucial in any such analysis, and I shall have occasion to refer to them again and again: The first, of course, is March 4, 1913, the birthday of the Democratic administration; the second is October 3, 1913, the date when the Underwood low-tariff law became effective; and the third, the day when the world war began, which may, for convenience, be assumed to be August 1, 1914.

With the enactment of the Underwood law there went on trial a tariff theory which had not been tested since the end of the second Cleveland administration, nearly 20 years earlier. Throughout the intervening period of Republican ascendency the theory—whether or not faultily applied in its details is not at the moment the question—had been that a duty should be levied on all imports from other countries at least sufficient to make up for the lower wage scale which prevailed in those countries; in short, the underlying theory was that our tariff should afford protection to our American wage earners against goods made where lower wages and standards of living made cheaper production possible.

With the advent of the Democratic Party a new theory of tariff making succeeded—that the tariff should be as low as possible—that is, that free trade should be as closely approximated as possible—having always in mind the necessity of raising sufficient funds to carry on the Government. This theory, variously described as the "revenue only" and as the "competitive" theory, found full expression in the Underwood law of October, 1913.

It may not be amiss to say a preliminary and general word about the operation of this law prior to the breaking out of the European war.

For the first seven months of 1913 (January to July, inclusive)—all under the Republican tariff—the imports from other countries into the United States amounted to about $1,016,000,000.

For the same seven months of 1914—all under the Democratic tariff and prior to the outbreak of the European war—the imports amounted to $1,137,000,000.

In other words, under the low-tariff theory of the Democratic Party we brought into this country before the war was even thought of $121,000,000 more foreign-made goods in seven months than we did in the same period of 1913 under the protective theory of the Republican tariff. In short, European and Asiatic labor (instead of American labor) was yearly getting the wages involved in the manufacture of over $200,000,000 worth of goods in excess of its allotment under Republican rule.

But American labor can be employed upon articles for export as well as upon articles for domestic consumption. We have just seen that the Democratic tariff cut deeply into the latter source of American employment. How did it affect the former?

For the first seven months of 1913—January to July, inclusive, all under the Republican tariff—exports from the United States to other countries amounted to about $1,323,000,000.

For the same seven months of 1914—all under a Democratic tariff and prior to the outbreak of the European war—our exports amounted to $1,198,000,000.

In other words, under the Democratic régime, before war was even declared, we sent out to other lands $125,000,000 fewer homemade goods in seven months than we did in the same period of the previous year under a Republican tariff—at the rate of over $200,000,000 a year.

We have seen that imports increased $121,000,000 in the seven months of the Underwood tariff and that exports decreased $125,000,000 in the same period. The sale of American-made goods had consequently fallen off some $246,000,000 in seven months, or at the rate of over $400,000,000 a year and more than a million dollars a day. Wage earners in America suffered accordingly; wage earners in Europe and Asia profited accordingly.

For the first time in 20 years our balance of trade was persistently against us. In the five months—April to August, inclusive, 1914—our imports exceeded our exports by nearly $40,000,000. Our exports had exceeded our imports during 1913 by about $60,000,000 a month; exports exceeded imports for the first nine months of 1914 by barely $9,000,000 a month.

It is no wonder that unemployment was rife during the first half of 1914; that bread lines and soup kitchens were once more established in our cities; that the Democratic Party trembled as it watched the workings of the tariff and its effect upon the industries of the country.

Then came the war. I shall examine in some detail the workings of the war upon our fiscal arrangements and our foreign trade. But first let me point out two or three things:

First. Obviously a world war would have some effect upon the foreign trade of the United States.

Second. The fairest time, therefore, to judge dispassionately the workings of a tariff law would be when the world was at peace, when foreign trade was normal.

Third. The natural effect of a great war would be to reduce somewhat the articles which the warring nations would send abroad for sale and to increase the articles which they would seek to purchase of neutrals.

Fourth. Clearly these manifestations are attributable to abnormal conditions, and have nothing to do with the merits or demerits of our tariff legislation.

Fifth. Naturally the party in power would seize upon the unsettled state of things to explain away any troubles of its own, however widely disconnected in fact with the war.

When the war had progressed a short time our imports diminished considerably below what they had been during the Democratic peace period, though not, as I shall show, below what they had been in Republican days. Our exports began similarly to increase, mainly by reason of "war orders." Times inevitably began to improve. But can this improvement be attributed to the Underwood tariff? The Democrats say, "Yes"; the Republicans and common sense say, "No, the European war is simply covering up in part the faults of your tariff theory by reducing imports while increasing exports, and thus establishing a sort of tariff of necessity." Curiously, however, the Democrats while claiming that conditions since the war began prove that their tariff is everything that it should be at the same time attribute their domestic financial straits to the war. In other words, they blow hot and blow cold.

Perhaps I may illustrate this last point by several recent utterances of eminent Democrats.

President Wilson said the other day:

> The Underwood law can not be held responsible for any appreciable reduction in revenue as a result of the war.

Secretary McAdoo, of the Treasury Department, in his annual report refers to certain decreases in revenue and says:

> Practically all of these decreases are the direct result of the European war.

On another occasion he said:

> Because of the decrease of imports on account of the war we have had an enormous deficit. This deficit would have been vastly larger, however, if the old tariff bill had been relied upon. At least $130,000,000 would have been added to the deficit had the country depended on the old bill.

Senator GORE said in Lowell last October:

> McCall says our national finances are disarranged. This is a vague accusation, but we say that the disorganization is due to the war and not to the tariff law or any other Democratic measure.

Here is certainly a cordial, though perhaps not too discriminating, blanket indorsement. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] said recently of our financial condition:

> This condition is due solely to the disturbed conditions resulting from the war.

Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Malburn says that the loss of customs revenue due to the war would have been much greater under a protective tariff than it has been under the Underwood law.

The newspapers have naturally sounded the same keynote. The Houston Post, for example, said the other day:

> Our imports from Europe (since the war) have been negligible.

Many Republican papers have taken up the cry. I quote from an editorial in a Republican protectionist newspaper:

> Part of the effects of the Underwood tariff may be judged by what had happened to our importations before the war intervened to afford to American industry a protection such as it never enjoyed in time of peace. For the present, the tariff is almost absolutely suspended as an element bearing on American manufacture. What would have happened to our cotton and woolen industry by this time if the war had not come along to interrupt almost completely the operation of foreign manufactories and the importation of goods into the United States?

It is easy to deduce from the foregoing quotations that the Democratic leaders have sought to impress two things upon the minds of the people, and that they have been generally successful with superficial observers in their endeavor:

First. That our importations have practically been brought to a standstill since the European war began.

Second. That the admitted financial difficulties of the United States Government are attributable to the loss of customs revenues which results from the suspension of imports.

It therefore becomes of consequence to consider the truth or falsity of the two statements which have been persistently advanced by so many Democratic speakers and writers during the past year.

Perhaps, however, the issue can be most clearly drawn by a further quotation from Secretary McAdoo:

> The European war seriously and adversely affected the revenues of the Government from imports. The revenue from customs for the month of October, 1914, was $16,000,000, and for the month of October, 1913, it was $30,000,000, showing a decrease in one month of $14,000,000. I have taken the month of October for the purpose of comparison, as the new tariff went into effect October, 1913, and duties were therefore the same. The reduction in revenues is due solely to the falling off in importations.

Here we have the issue squarely presented by the Secretary of the Treasury himself: "The reduction in revenues is due solely to the falling off in importations."

But if we turn to the figures issued by his colleague, the Secretary of Commerce, and showing the importations for the months in question, we find:

Imports.

October, 1913	$132,949,302
October, 1914	138,080,520
October, 1915	149,172,729

Thus it appears that the imports, instead of falling off, actually increased over $5,000,000 in October, 1914, when half the world was at war, as compared with October, 1913, 10 months before the war had begun.

It seems incredible that the Secretary of the Treasury made the above statement with intent to deceive; yet it must be admitted that he was guilty either of such intent or of gross carelessness almost equally culpable. Manifestly as far as the month of October is concerned "the reduction in revenues" is not due solely or at all "to the falling off in importations."

But this, it may be said, was, after all, but one month. How about the war period as a whole? Does it show a great shrinkage in imports? An examination of the figures issued by the Secretary of Commerce shows that the importations have, in general, decreased somewhat during the Democratic war period (Aug., 1914, to date) as compared with the Democratic peace period (Oct., 1913, to Aug., 1914). But, as I have said, the imports during the Democratic peace period were swollen out of all proportion and broke all records in our history. A fairer comparison is with imports under the Republican tariff just before its repeal, during the spring and summer months of 1913.

The imports May, 1913, to August, 1913, averaged $135,000,000 per month.

The imports March, 1915, to December, 1915, averaged well over $150,000,000 per month.

In other words, our imports during the war have recently been averaging $15,000,000 a month more than our imports two years earlier and just prior to the enactment of the Underwood law. For the entire war period, including the months when foreign trade was at its lowest ebb, the average imports are over $140,000,000 a month, or $5,000,000 a month more than in Republican days. But, as I say, with things continuing as they now are, the increase in imports is $15,000,000 a month, or $180,000,000 a year over Republican imports.

Our recent imports, as shown by the bulletins of the Department of Commerce, have been:

Fiscal year ended—
1911	$1,527,226,105
1912	1,653,264,934
1913	1,813,008,234
1914	1,893,925,657
1915	1,674,169,740

Our recent imports entered for consumption have been:

Fiscal year ended—
1911	$1,527,945,652
1912	1,640,722,902
1913	1,766,689,412
1914	1,906,400,394
1915	1,648,386,280

The imports for the year 1912 were larger by $100,000,000 than those of any previous year in our history. It will be seen that the imports for 1915, including 11 war months, were $21,000,000 larger than the record 1912 year and were exceeded only by the Democratic years 1913 and 1914. The 1915 imports exceeded those for 1911 by nearly $150,000,000.

Does all this sound like a "dormant" or a "suspended" tariff? Are the imports really "negligible"? In point of fact, the imports are to-day ahead of the Republican high-water mark, although doubtless somewhat below what the Democratic tariff would permit to be dumped upon us if there were no war. [Applause.]

It is undoubtedly true, I repeat, that the war has somewhat served to neutralize the worst effects of the Underwood tariff. To that extent it operates indirectly as a protective tariff. But it is by no means a tariff wall. In June, 1915, for example, our imports were $157,695,140—larger than those of any June in our history, Republican or Democratic, war or peace. This figure is $26,000,000 more than the June, 1913, figure and is 57 per cent in excess of the mark established in the boom year 1906. As we have seen, October, 1915, imports were larger than for either October, 1913 or 1914. November, 1915, imports were $164,312,169, the largest of the 16 war months, and exceeded by but 2 of the 10 Democratic peace months. They are the largest November imports in our history. December's imports were seven and one-half millions larger even than November's—$171,841,665. These are with one exception, 1913, the largest December imports in history.

We have heard much concerning the financial struggles of the United States during the past two years. The Secretary of the Treasury attributes our difficulties "solely to the falling off in importations." We have seen that in fact there has been no falling off in importations as compared with Republican times; quite the contrary. Yet it is undoubtedly true that customs revenues have materially fallen off.

For the period January, 1913, to October, 1913, our customs receipts, under the Republican tariff, averaged $27,000,000 per month.

For the period January, 1915, to November, 1915—the Democratic war period—our customs receipts, in spite of the fact that our imports were on the average a little larger, averaged $16,000,000 per month. Thus with about the same imports we are losing about $11,000,000 a month customs revenues, or $132,000,000 a year.

There is the real explanation of our empty Treasury. The reduction in duties has reduced the revenues; the reduction in importations is a myth in spite of the stress laid upon it by Democratic apologists.

The whole story is told by an examination of the average rates of duty paid upon imports year by year. In the second Cleveland administration this average ad valorem rate was about 20 per cent. During the dozen years of the Dingley tariff it ranged from 22 per cent to 29 per cent. During the Payne tariff it ranged from 17 per cent to 21 per cent. For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1915, the first full fiscal year of the Underwood law, it was 12.49 per cent—by far the lowest for a century. Since June it has been sinking even lower and now does not exceed 10 per cent—certainly a close approximation to free trade. For the week ending Christmas Day the rate was 8.7 per cent. This means, of course, that, the imports remaining the same, for every dollar which goes into our Treasury at this rate of duty $2 or $2.50 would have gone in if Republican rates had been maintained. Another interesting sidelight upon the present-day workings of the Democratic tariff is that over 70 per cent of all goods recently entering the country have come in without paying a cent's worth of duty. The other 30 per cent is bearing the burden, imperfectly, of course, but nevertheless as best it can. Under Republican tariffs from 40 per cent to 50 per cent only came in altogether free of duty, and the burden was distributed over at least one-half of all imports, instead of as to-day over less than one-third.

The customs revenues for the last fiscal year were $209,786,672, realized, as above stated, from duties averaging about 12½ per cent upon $1,674,169,740 worth of imports. If a rate of only 20 per cent had been assessed upon these imports, the resulting duties would have been $335,000,000, or about $125,000,000 in excess of what they were in fact. This solution would have put into the Treasury nearly $50,000,000 more than has the iniquitous war tax, with all its annoyances and vexations. In substantiation of this statement it is worth remembering that a Republican protective tariff made possible the building of the Panama Canal without imposing any considerable burden upon the people, but, instead, mainly out of the "loose change" which the Treasury had in its pockets. If we had retained Republican duties and observed reasonable economy, we could have embarked upon the proposed program of national defense without further taxation of any kind.

I have heard the statement made by certain Democrats that, admitting that imports began to flood the country when the Underwood law was enacted, nevertheless that these imports were mainly of raw materials or of goods only partly manufactured, so that their arrival meant more work for United States wage earners. Nothing could be further from the fact, as an examination of the figures of the Department of Commerce will show. Take, for example, the imports of manufactures of cotton and wool, in which the district which I represent is vitally interested:

Cotton cloths.

	10 months ending July—
	1913 (Republican peace period).	1914 (Democratic peace period).	1915 (Democratic war period).
Square yards	36,735,303	56,713,780	36,978,608
Value	$6,712,274	$10,896,575	$5,671,198

This little table shows two interesting things:

First. The first effect of the Underwood law was to increase the imports of cotton cloth by 54 per cent, or, in other words, to substitute in 10 months, for 20,000,000 yards of American-made goods 20,000,000 yards of foreign-made goods. Four million dollars more went across the ocean to pay for these goods; all this would have remained in the United States under a Republican tariff.

Second. Though importations are said to be "dormant" because of the war, we imported more yards of cotton cloth in 10 war months than we did in the corresponding months under a Republican tariff.

The situation with reference to imports of manufactures of wool is briefly as follows:

Wool manufactures.

Seven months ending July—
1913 (Republican peace period)	$8,870,101
1914 (Democratic peace period)	29,239,274
1915 (Democratic war period)	11,240,251

It will be here noted that—

First. For every dollar of wool manufactures that was imported under the Republican tariff, $3.30 was imported after the enactment of the Underwood law and before the war broke out.

Second. Even since the "tariff wall," alleged by certain leading Democrats to have resulted from the war, our imports of wool manufactures are about one-third larger than under the Republican tariff.

United States Consul Ingram at Bradford, England, reported a large increase of January, 1914, textile reports. The Bradford correspondent of the Daily Trade Record said:

If anyone had forecasted that in December of 1913 more dress goods would be sent from Bradford to the United States than in the 11 months previous, very few people would have believed him. But the lower duties have had a wonderful influence on the West Riding trade. Dress goods to the value of £131,570 ($639,430) have been exported, compared with £131,071 ($637,005) for the first 11 months of 1913.

A startling increase in worsted coatings on last January of over 500 per cent has to be recorded. This shows that Yorkshire is going to clothe part of the American nation.

It apparently can not be said with truth that the war—much less the Underwood tariff—operates to bar out completed manufactures of the kind which competes most directly with our own workmen.

If I were to attempt to summarize briefly the effect of the Underwood tariff, in peace and war, upon imports and revenues, I should say this:

First. During the months just before the war, but under the Underwood law, our imports were about $25,000,000 a month more than for the previous year under Republican rule, while our customs revenues were about $5,000,000 a month less. American workmen were making fewer goods at the rate of $300,000,000 a year, and our customs were nevertheless decreasing at the rate of $60,000,000 a year. It is not difficult to account for the unemployment and industrial disaster which were rampant, or to guess what would have happened in 1915 had not war intervened.

Second. Since the war, imports have been, in general, a little more than in the last months of the Republican tariff. Revenues, owing to the low ad valorem rates, have decreased enormously.

Prosperity in the United States can, generally speaking, be promoted by keeping down to a reasonable figure the imports, or by increasing the exports, or both. The United States happily is to-day enjoying a considerable measure of prosperity, conspicuously in contrast with the situation in the spring and summer of 1914. Why? Manifestly for two reasons:

First. Because the war has checked the unconscionably large imports which were flooding the country during the six or eight months just preceding its outbreak, reducing them about to the Republican level.

Second. Because, as everybody knows, "war orders" have increased our exports almost beyond belief.

With apparent lack of candor, Secretary Redfield seems to attempt to make the American people believe that our export trade is normal, healthy, permanent business, attributable to the genius of the Democratic administration. He says:

You who are told that the increase of exports which has turned the balance of trade in our favor is due to munitions of war are mistaken, if you believe that.

We have seen that under the peace period of the Underwood tariff, our imports, for months at a time, were exceeding our exports; that is, the balance of trade was against us.

To-day our exports are enormously exceeding our imports by from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 per month. That is, the balance of trade is heavily in our favor.

Does anyone doubt that this unprecedented overturn is ascribable to anything but war orders? Of course not. Secretary Redfield knows it, but apparently seeks to pull the wool over our eyes by limiting his statement to "munitions of war." We are, in part, feeding, clothing, and arming the armies of Europe, and whether you call our exports for this purpose "munitions of war" or "war orders," it in no way alters the nature of our trade.

The following table shows a few of the conspicuous increases in exports. Can anyone doubt their cause?

Articles exported.

[1] 2 months war.

Brass and its manufactures, automobiles, chemicals and drugs, rubber goods, iron and steel manufactures, boots, shoes, leather, sugar, and zinc are the other articles which show tremendous increases. The explanation of each is, of course, patent.

The following quotation from a Lowell paper of December 24 last shows more clearly than any words of mine could show the nature and extent of our prosperity of to-day and the reasons for it. Eighteen months ago this concern was employing 600 people; in a few months it will be employing over 8,000:

The largest amount of money ever paid out by a mercantile corporation in this city was distributed yesterday by the United States Cartridge Co. when its employees received not only their regular weekly wages but, in addition, the money in back pay due them as a result of the finding of the State board of arbitration in the recent hearing granted as an outcome of the strike.

The amount disbursed yesterday totaled $100,000 and was distributed among 6,400 employees. Of this sum $30,000 was the money due on back wages, in accordance with the increase fixed by the State board, to commence September 28. The balance represented the regular weekly pay roll of the company.

Perhaps I can do no better than to quote the recent words of a distinguished Democrat of Massachusetts, Mr. E. F. McSweeney, chairman of the directors of the port of Boston:

The belief that our foreign trade has improved since the war is unjustified. The great increase in the value of our exports is due wholly to the demand for supplies and materials used in warfare and has upset the industrial balance of the United States. At the present time we are sending out of this country to the warring nations of Europe munitions and accessories of war at the rate of $100,000,000 per month in excess of the normal export before the war. This means that we have about 800,000 wage earners employed for a full year who at the close of the war will be the innocent victims of the gigantic readjustment that must take place in industrial America.

Our prosperity to-day carries great dangers with it. There is no doubt that after the war there will be an extreme reaction, and the longer the war lasts the harsher and more severe this will be.

Our trade balance for the year ending June 30, 1915, in normal legitimate merchandise was smaller than it has been since 1910 and almost $200,000,000 less than that of the year before the war.

In September last, in sending me a speech delivered by Mr. McSweeney, one of his associates wrote me as follows:

The artificial stimulation to trade due to the export of war orders has given our wage earners an opportunity for employment, but this flurry has operated to obscure the vitally important question of the permanent extension of our export trade on a normal basis. If the war should cease to-morrow, it is likely that the business of this country would be thrown into great disorganization, and wage earners especially would suffer.

Of the present trade balance of $1,000,000,000 in favor of the United States, over $700,000,000 are exports solely for war purposes—ammunition, horses, auto trucks, army shoes, foodstuffs, etc.—trade which will cease the instant the war comes to a close. This leaves a balance of only $300,000,000 of exports of what might be termed "regular merchandise," an export smaller than that of any year since 1909, and almost $200,000,000 less than in the year before the war.

Comparing the present year of exports from the United States with that of the year before the war, we find we have exported only 32 per cent as much agricultural implements, 52 per cent as much sewing machines, and 33 per cent as much steel rails. The most lamentable fact in connection with these figures is that we are losing as much, if not more, to the countries which are not at war as to those which have given up domestic pursuits to take up armed conflict.

Last year's figures show that of our sewing-machine export trade the total in 1915 was only 54 per cent of the 1914 figures; that to South America but 20 per cent, and that to Africa, Asia, and the Pacific islands but 35 per cent of the corresponding previous year.

Our exports of the staple merchandise which we hope to sell under normal conditions after the war are smaller by a large percentage in practically everything except war orders, and we are losing our exports trade much faster to the neutral countries than to the belligerent ones.

Doubtless we all are thankful that we are spared participation in the horrors of war; doubtless we recognize that we are within our rights in selling all we can to the belligerents, and that in so doing we are accorded a prosperity which would otherwise be denied us. And yet I doubt if any of us are very proud of this blood-soaked prosperity. The growth which has come to us is of a dropsical character; it is not a normal, healthy, permanent increase in bone and sinew. It will leave us almost in an instant when the war ends.

More than this, as even Secretary Redfield recognizes, when the war ends we shall be subjected to the bitterest competition in history from the countries of Europe which are now at war, but which, after peace is declared, will at once go to work, and yet will be too poor to buy. They will "dump" their products upon us in unbelievable quantity.

How are we to protect ourselves against this industrial invasion? In only one way—by a protective tariff. In this connection an editorial from one of the leading Democratic newspapers of the country (Boston Globe, Nov. 9, 1915) is of interest:

WE MUST PREPARE FOR INDUSTRIAL INVASION AFTER EUROPEAN WAR.

American business conditions will be more disturbed after the great war than during the conflict. At present the belligerent nations are absorbed in crushing each other. Now they are seeking to buy all that we can sell, from shrapnel to shoestrings. With the coming of peace those nations will try to recuperate from their enormous losses by grabbing all the world trade they have lost. An industrial war, in which we will have the most to lose, and into which we shall be drawn, will follow the present crisis. Obviously we must prepare to meet the coming struggle in the best way to safeguard American industry.

The commercial prosperity of this country will be attacked from both flanks. We shall lose our munitions market. This will mean much readjustment of capital and labor. Factories now working overtime to supply war materials must be converted to other lines of trade. How seriously this transition will affect American industry will, of course, depend upon our skill and forethought.

The other attack will come from the belligerent nations themselves in their effort to recover lost trade. To-day their industries are being pauperized by child and female labor. Women have gone into industry to take the place of men who have gone to the front. Since many of the men who have gone to the front will never come back, many of the women who have gone into industry will never go back to home life.

The men who do come back will be forced to seek almost any kind of work they can find to cover the difference between their pensions and a living wage. All this means pauperized industry. Low wages will enable those nations to produce cheap goods. This sudden rejuvenation of production will create commercial rivalry between the new European producers and the American manufacturers, particularly the Americans who have gone into making goods that Europe produced before the war.

The European nations will seek ruthlessly to crush their American rivals, since we shall be their principal opponents in their efforts to recover from the losses by war. Their method will be the most effective one possible. This method is "dumping."

Dumping is an economic expression used to define the industrial process of ruining a rival by selling goods in the rival's territory at prices so low that the rival can not meet them.

Goods produced cheaply will be poured into the United States after the war to undersell American-made goods produced in normal conditions. Our budding dye industry, for example, will be swamped under a flood of German chemicals, sold at prices below the cost of production here.

The sudden renewal of peaceful industry in Europe will soon create a surplus of goods. Then will come the most dangerous form of dumping. Since it is obvious that the European manufacturers will be anxious to maintain prices at home, where they have less competition, they will dump their surplus goods into America at prices even below the cost of production in Europe. This will be killing two birds with one stone. It will be getting rid of an embarrassing surplus which, if kept in Europe, would reduce prices there; it will also be a crushing blow to American rivalry, which had grown during the war.

It is evident that we must be prepared to meet this competition. If we do nothing to stop this flood of European pauper goods our country will suffer one of its worst financial panics. Many businesses will be ruined. Thousands of men will be thrown out of work; the labor market will be drugged with hungry men; the soup kitchen; the bread line; scared capital; industrial chaos.

It is time now, therefore, for us to prepare for the coming industrial war. It is a menace far more vital than actual war, over which we are so much concerned. For us it is a question of national defense arising out of a colossal international war, and it must be met with broad-minded statecraft and not by any party politics.

Obviously we must put up our defenses and place them in the hands of skilled business strategists. It is not a question that can be solved in congressional hearing rooms.

Secretary of Commerce Redfield has a tentative plan to curb European industries by an amendment to the antitrust laws, forbidding foreign corporations from doing business in this country unless they conform to our Sherman law. This means endless litigation, with no hope of a solution until long after the crisis has passed, most of the damage done, American business invaded from coast to coast.

The Sherman law causes enough tribulation in American business circles now without our seeking to apply it to the rest of the world. It will cause more confusion when, of all times, we shall want less. It would be just the method by which to aid the jealous European countries to ruin our new prosperity.

The question is too vital for confusing litigation. It is a question of national defense. Our Army could not repel an invasion by appealing to the Sherman antitrust law. We must not expect our industrial army to suffer this invasion.

Our industrial defense is our tariff. We must keep out pauper goods from war-sodden Europe. The problem is economic and complicated. We must have an industrial board of strategy to watch the situation, learn all its ramifications, and close all gaps in our defenses. This board must be an expert tariff commission.

"Our industrial defense is our tariff." That tells the whole story. The war saved the Democratic Party for the moment; when peace comes nothing can save it from utter dissolution but the adoption of the protective-tariff principle. Some of its statesmen seem to recognize that this is true.

For example, Senator LEWIS, of Illinois, is quoted in the Louisville Courier-Journal of October 31, 1915, as having spoken in part as follows at a rally in Mount Sterling, Ky.:

No intelligent man would urge that the adoption of either of the past tariff systems—that of the unqualified high prohibition of any imports to this country, known as protective tariff of the Republicans, or that other of no tariff beyond that for the purpose of raising revenue, of the Democrats—could be appropriately applied as conserving the uses of the future and as fitting to the future welfare of America.

To allow the manufactured article of Europe to come without limit to this country as a Democratic theory, the goods to be sold at such price as Europe could take in order to obtain money to build up her wasted places, would be to overcome our own manufactures and slay the possibility of establishing in America plants to take the place of those which heretofore in Europe served the uses of America and the world.

Still more recently, in a signed editorial published in the New York American of December 26, 1915, William Randolph Hearst "earnestly urged the Democratic Party to abandon its free-trade policy, a policy which had persistently proved a disastrous failure, which had continually plunged the country into the depths of financial depression during Democratic administrations, and which had invariably resulted in a deficiency of revenue, which had to be met by extraordinary taxation or bond issues."

Mr. Hearst says:

Our so-called war taxes, the burden of which was lately reimposed upon the country by Congress, are, as a matter of fact, not war taxes at all. They are free-trade taxes.

ASSESSED TO MEET DEFICIT.

They are the tax additions which invariably follow Democratic tariff reductions.

They are direct assessments, levied upon the public to meet the deficit caused by the customary and conventional Democratic experiments in free trade.

However destructive the ultimate effect of the European war may be upon the foreign markets of this country, the immediate effect of the war has undoubtedly been to increase the consumption and accentuate the demand in Europe for a considerable number of our American products.

GREAT EUROPEAN DEMAND.

All sorts of food supplies and all sorts of manufactured articles required by the gigantic European armies have been in unusual demand and at extraordinary prices.

America therefore has sold an unusual amount of certain products at exceptionally high rates, with great commercial and financial advantage.

On the other hand, the scarcity of productive European labor, the demands of Europe for its own materials, the difficulties and dangers of transportation by sea, have to a considerable extent excluded European products from the United States.

COUNTRY SAVED FROM DISASTER.

The European war, therefore, and the conditions which it has created, should have brought unprecedented, even though impermanent, prosperity to the United States, and if the war has failed to do this, because of the Democratic depression which it has had first to overcome, it has, at any rate, saved the country from the full disaster of the Democratic policy of reckless tariff reduction.

We have as yet, therefore, fortunately felt but little of free-trade disaster, and only such free-trade depression as must follow conditions of business disturbance, combined with the daze of uncertainty and the dread of impending injury.

Soon, however, the European war must end. Then the full effect of the Democratic policy of unscientific tariff reduction will fall upon our country.

ARTIFICIAL DEMAND TO END.

We will then no longer have the enormous artificial demand for war supplies and food products which has partly sustained our industries, or, rather, which has sustained part of our industries during this war period.

We must then confront the unhappy condition of having our markets much more than ever open to European competition, and our own products much less than ever in demand in European markets.

The present administration is no doubt well meaning enough, but it is impractical and inexperienced.

It is an administration of theories and vagaries, of prejudices and impulses, of incongruities and inconsistencies.

It is an administration of visionary policy conceived in vanity and confirmed in fanatical obstinacy. Our national yield of golden fleece from wealth-producing industries will be diminished to a proportionate degree. Our national resources in products and profits, in work and wages, will be decreased to a similar extent.

Not only individuals, but the Nation has felt a lack of income despite the artificial stimulus of war prices.

Thus taxes have been increased, although our ability to pay them is not as great as it once was.

And the end is not yet.

We have still to face the full and final results of Democratic folly and fatuity, which will surely be upon us at the end of the European war.

Why, then, should the Democratic Party, now reassembled in Congress, not take advantage of the temporary respite which the war provides?

Why should the Democrats in Congress, and in the administration, too, if there be any there, not realize and admit that a tariff for revenue and for protection is not merely a Republican policy—it is an American policy?

It has been approved by the American people, it has been indorsed by history, fortified by fact and sustained by experience.

Two or three sentences of Mr. Hearst's editorial are worthy of especial emphasis:

Our so-called war taxes, the burden of which was lately reimposed upon the country by Congress, are, as a matter of fact, not war taxes at all. They are free-trade taxes.

They are the tax additions which invariably follow Democratic tariff reductions.

Soon, however, the European war must end. Then the full effect of the Democratic policy of unscientific tariff reduction will fall upon our country.

We have still to face the full and final results of Democratic folly and fatuity, which will surely be upon us at the end of the European war.

Why should the Democrats in Congress not realize and admit that a tariff for revenue and for protection is not merely a Republican policy—it is an American policy?

The country can not afford to have the Underwood tariff operative for a single month after peace is declared. It was a failure and a scourge before the war; it is a failure and a menace to-day.

How did it fulfill the high hopes of its sponsors?

President Wilson said in his first address to Congress, April 8, 1913:

The object of the tariff duties henceforth laid must be effective competition, the whetting of American wits by contest with the wits of the rest of the world.

When the Underwood bill was signed by him October 2, 1913, he said:

I feel a very peculiar pleasure in what I have just done. I have had the accomplishment of something like this at heart ever since I was a boy.

Within a few weeks he is reported to have said to the Democratic national committeemen that the tariff was the only issue that the Republican Party had.

While I do not admit the truth of this statement, I think few Republicans would hesitate to take up the gauntlet thus thrown down by the President. But the point I wish to emphasize is that the Underwood law, with all its direful results, was no careless blunder; it represents the considered, final judgment of the leaders of the Democratic Party.

Senator SIMMONS, who had charge of the bill in the Senate, said (1) that it would prove adequate as a revenue producer with an estimated surplus of revenue at the close of the fiscal year 1914 of $16,000,000 and at the close of the fiscal year 1915 of $18,000,000, and (2) that it "will cut down the cost of living."

Mr. UNDERWOOD, in charge of the bill in the House, expressed himself similarly:

This law will do four things:
First. It will reduce the cost of living in the United States.
Second. It will not disturb the business of the country.
Third. It will increase our foreign trade.
Fourth. It will collect revenue sufficient to run the Government.

Let us take up these points in order.

First. Has the Underwood law reduced the cost of living? Both Mr. UNDERWOOD and Speaker CLARK emphatically predicted it would. Every householder can answer this question for himself.

The Democratic Party realized the importance of the problem. Its 1912 platform says:

The high cost of living is a serious problem in every American home; and we assert that no substantial relief can be secured for the people until import duties on the necessaries of life are materially reduced.

Over 70 per cent of our imports now enter duty free. The average rate of duty is only 10 per cent. Nevertheless, where is the cost of living to-day? Common sense gives a complete answer, and scientifically assembled figures are at hand to corroborate common sense. In the New York Times Annalist appears weekly a "cost-of-living" index number.

An index number is a means of showing fluctuations in the average price of a group of commodities. The Annalist index number shows the fluctuations in the average wholesale price of 25 food commodities selected and arranged to represent a theoretical family's food budget.

For 1910 the index number was 137.
For 1911 the index number was 130.8.
For 1912 the index number was 142.9.
For 1913 the index number was 139.98.
For 1914 the index number was 146.07.
For 1915 the index number was 148.05.

In other words, the household supplies which are in daily use upon the table of the average family and which cost in 1911, a Republican year, $1.31, cost last year, a Democratic year, $1.48. Was this increase due to the war? In 1914, a Democratic year, during more than one-half of which peace reigned, the figure was but 2 cents less—$1.46. These figures for 1914 and 1915, as compared with the Republican year 1911, represent percentages of increase, respectively, of 11.5 per cent and 13 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I will.

Mr. SMITH of New York. In view of the artificial increase in trade, the gentleman would hardly argue that the Underwood tariff law has had a fair chance of operation or that these prices are due in any way to the Underwood law?

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I should answer that question in this way: I was rather inclined to think some one would ask the question. The war broke out August 1, 1914. For seven months of 1914 the world was at peace. Probably for at least a month or two thereafter, namely, for the months of August and September, no one would claim that there was any great fluctuation attributable to the war in the prices of the foodstuffs in this country. Certainly for seven-twelfths of the year 1914 there was no war at all, and therefore no possible effect from it upon the prices of our foodstuffs. Yet, as I say, for 1914, taking the year as a whole, the index number was 146, as compared with 148, the index number for 1915. I think myself that the European war has not had very much effect upon the cost of living in this country. It may be that some gentlemen can not agree with me, but I have made some study into that question, and that is my careful conclusion.

Second. Did the Underwood law disturb the business of the country? This, again, is a matter of common knowledge and common sense. I will, however, quote an expert's summary of business conditions in 1914, before war burst over Europe:

Let me summarize some of the features which marked our industrial condition during the first year of the Underwood-Simmons law, features which President Wilson called "a state of mind." Among them are 18,280 failures during the year 1914, the worst record in history in number, and exceeded in amount of liabilities only by another fateful Democratic year, 1893. Bank clearings, a fair measure of the country's business, were nearly $20,000,000,000, or 11.1 per cent less than they were in 1912, the last year of Republican administration. Capital invested in new enterprises was less by over $600,000,000 in 1914 than in 1913 and over $700,000,000 less than in 1912. Railroad gross earnings declined 4.4 per cent; iron production, 25.3 per cent; and copper deliveries, 15 per cent. Steel mills were reduced 40 per cent of capacity; 30 per cent of the looms of our woolen mills were idle on December 1; and capital amounting to $41,000,000 invested in cotton mills was unproductive. The importations of boots and shoes, though still not alarmingly large in amount, have more than doubled. The importation of cotton cloths has increased 80 per cent. England's exports of woolens to the United States show the phenomenal increase to 8,219,000 yards in 1914, as compared with 2,190,000 in 1913, while in the case of worsteds England's shipments to the United States were 32,790,000 yards, against only 9,218,000 in the preceding year.

The most careful surveys showed that where there was one man unemployed in 1913–14 there were two unemployed during the winter of 1914–15. Without exaggeration, it was conceded by those familiar with conditions that one out of every five bread winners was unemployed. This unemployment was concentrated in cities primarily, but the small towns and villages also felt the shock and found it necessary to organize relief measures.

An official canvass in Philadelphia showed 200,000 men unemployed; the house-to-house canvass of the Metropolitan Insurance Co. of its policyholders in New York, thrifty people ordinarily, gave the basis for an estimate of 357,000 men and women out of work in the entire city. The labor organizations in New York City estimated that 472,102 were either out of work or on part time. In Chicago in January the municipal markets commission estimated 189,866 out of work. A Cleveland survey in December showed 61,000 unemployed. The city charities in Philadelphia estimated that Philadelphia's unemployed numbered 175,000.

Third. Has the Underwood law increased our foreign trade, as its author predicted it would?

Prior to the war the total volume of foreign trade—imports and exports combined—was nearly as large as for the corresponding months under a Republican tariff. But, as we have seen, imports—made by European workmen—were vastly larger, and exports—made by American workmen—were smaller in about the same amount. The American workman was, therefore, getting the short end in each respect. The "total-volume" basis of comparison is grossly misleading and utterly worthless under these circumstances. Since the war our exports have increased greatly, as we have seen, and our total volume of trade with them. But, as Mr. McSweeney points out, this is in no way attributable to the Underwood law.

Fourth. Has the Underwood law collected sufficient revenue to run the Government, as its author promised?

I have already dealt somewhat with this topic, but a complete answer involves study into the history of our Treasury during the past two or three years.

At the outset, it may be stated that the majority members of the Committee on Ways and Means, in their recent report recommending the extension of the "war tax," themselves admit the present dire straits of the Treasury. President Wilson, in his address to Congress of August 4, 1914, when first recommending the war tax, and again in his annual address delivered to the Congress last month, recognizes the gravity of the situation.

Commenting on these statements, the minority members of the Ways and Means Committee point out:

We, the minority members of the Ways and Means Committee, agree with the majority that the Treasury of the United States is in a distressing condition, and that additional revenues must be raised to meet the current expenses of the Government. We deny the statement of the majority that the necessity for an emergency revenue law is due mainly to conditions resulting from the war in Europe, and we assert that the deficit is due mainly to reduced rates of duty on imports provided for in the Underwood Tariff Act.

On September 4, 1914, when the President of the United States delivered his message to Congress urging the immediate enactment of additional revenue legislation, he compared customs receipts for the month of August, 1913, when the Payne Tariff Act was in effect, with the month of August, 1914, when the Underwood Tariff Act was in effect, and showed a loss in customs receipts of some $10,000,000. However, during the eight months preceding the war in Europe customs receipts averaged but $22,200,000 per month, while the month of August, 1913, produced $30,934,952. The loss in customs receipts was, therefore, very evident prior to the war in Europe.

Contrary to the impression conveyed by the majority report, imports at this time are not below normal. Imports for the eight months ended November 1, 1915, amount to $1,203,452,698, an increase of $56,000,000 over the corresponding eight months of 1913, when adequate customs receipts were being collected by the Government. In the table presented by the majority imports for the recent months are ignored completely. During this eight-month period, showing an increase of imports of $56,000,000, the customs revenue receipts have declined to the extent of $77,000,000. The average ad valorem rate of duty collected on imports during the 1913 period was 18.4 per cent, and during the 1915 period it was 11.1 per cent. This is due to the change in revenue laws and not the war in Europe. It is interesting and instructive to compare importations and customs receipts for the month of August, 1913 (the month on which the President based his calculations showing the necessity of additional revenue), with the month of August, 1915.

Imports, August, 1913	$137,651,553
Imports, August, 1915	141,804,202
Gain in imports	4,152,649
Customs receipts, August, 1913	30,934,952
Customs receipts, August, 1915	15,780,540
Loss in revenue	15,154,412

Much of what is here quoted I have already discussed at length, but the statement is so clear and pertinent that I think it is worth including by way of summary.

But what are the facts as to the state of the Treasury? In the financial analysis issued daily by the Secretary of the Treasury appears an item, "Net balance in the general fund." This shows the cash on hand which Uncle Sam can use to pay his bills for supplies, employees, and so forth. It corresponds roughly with the checking account of an individual or a corporation:

July 1, 1914, the first day of the fiscal year, 1915, the net balance was	$145,835,502
June 1, 1915, it was	14,000,000
(A loss of over $130,000,000 in 11 months, or about $12,000,000 a month.)
June 30, 1915, owing to income-tax collections, it had risen to	82,025,716
September 30, 1915, it had shrunk to	40,898,894
(A loss of about $14,000,000 per month, although, as we have seen, our imports were in excess of 1913 imports.)

The press was full of warning articles, calling attention to the gravity of the financial danger. These warnings apparently got "under the skin" of Secretary McAdoo and "something happened" in the Treasury that memorable night of September 30, 1915. The time-honored method of showing our financial status was abandoned, and the statement of October 1, 1915, to the unbounded surprise of all of us who were watching with alarm our rapidly shrinking surplus, showed a balance of $128,063,000. In other words, if the figures were to be believed, we had "made" $87,000,000 overnight. Were we really richer by that or by any other amount? Not at all. The change was in bookkeeping; it was psychological, that is all. There was not an additional dollar in the Treasury.

How was this change wrought? By two alterations in the old method:

First. Funds turned over by the Treasury to the various disbursing officers of the Government and made available for payment by them of specific Government debts have always, and rightly, been treated as actual payments. They are no longer of any use to the Government, any more than the amount is to us which is represented by a check which we have drawn and sent to the payee. Secretary McAdoo in his statement of October 1 calmly treats these amounts as still assets of the Treasury. He thus captures a neat little item of over $61,000,000 and adds it to his "balance."

Second. Money paid in by national banks to retire their bank notes has always been treated as a liability. It is deposited for one specific purpose, and can not be applied to any other; yet Secretary McAdoo removes this fund, amounting to over $23,000,000, from the liability side of this account and adds that also to his "balance."

I do not charge that Secretary McAdoo was dishonest in apparently adding $87,000,000 to the Treasury by a stroke of the pen. The true figures can still be deduced by careful scrutiny from the statements in their present form. But I do charge that the changes were made, not for financial reasons but for political reasons. On December 17 last the able chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, Mr. GLASS, made an elaborate defense of Secretary McAdoo's course. Yet he admitted that as to the second change above referred to—

I venture to think that trust funds should not be counted as available Treasury funds—

And as to the first change, that—

Should anybody ask a layman's opinion as to the proper place of this account on the ledger, I would be disposed to say that it should be segregated in the accounting as well as in fact.

And the expert whom he quotes in defense of the Secretary concludes by saying:

When all has been said that can be said, it remains true nevertheless that these repeated changes by one administration after another in the form and character of the debt and Treasury statements are disturbing and highly objectionable, if for no other reason that they render difficult comparisons with the past on an identical basis. The lesson which the experience teaches would seem to be that the character and contents of these statements ought to be prescribed by law so as to render it impossible for each new head of the Treasury Department to impose on the form of the statement his own ideas as to what it should be.

Secretary McAdoo's formal announcement gives as the reason for the changes that they are in order to make the statements "more intelligible and clearer to the public." I think that even the most ardent admirer of the Secretary would scarcely claim that, made as they were made and when they were made, they were either calculated to serve, or did serve, this laudable purpose.

What has been the course of this inflated balance during the last three and a half months? From $128,000,000 on October 1 it was $100,541,000 on January 16 last—a loss of $28,000,000 in three and a half months, or at the rate of $8,000,000 a month. If the two disputed items—aggregating $83,000,000—were removed from the balance shown in the January 16 statement, there would remain as our true "net balance" but about $17,000,000, as compared with the figure of $145,000,000 on July 1, 1914. Not all this $17,000,000 is regarded as "available" in the sense that it can be readily used to pay our bills. Small silver and other fractional currency and bullion have always been deducted in determining our available balance. These amounted, on January 16, to $27,000,000. So far as available funds went we had, with nearly six months of the fiscal year yet to run, an actual deficit in the Treasury of $10,000,000.

A recent statement of Harvey S. Chase, certified public accountant, who has in the past been employed as an expert by Secretary McAdoo, may be of interest in this connection, although dealing with a date last October, when conditions were materially better than on January 16:

On August 4, 1913, the "free available balance" in the Treasury office and in banks was $106,793,571.44. This I know to be correct, as I was at work in the United States Treasury at that time, and the form of statement from July 1, 1913, to August 4, and for some time later, was prepared under my personal supervision. "Subsidiary silver coin," "silver bullion," and "minor coin" were not included in the balance of one hundred and six millions, as stated above. I have compared the statement of August 4, 1913, with the statement of October 23, 1915, in which $30,472,159.60 of "subsidiary silver coin," "silver bullion," and "minor coin" are included in the balance. This amount should properly be deducted from the stated balance.

On August 4, 1913, disbursing officers' balances, amounting to $69,817,050.50, were included among the liabilities and the "national bank-notes redemption fund" was also included as a liability. It then amounted to $20,760,883.50. Both these amounts were included as liabilities at that time and they have been so included up to October 1, 1915, whereas on October 23, 1915, they are excluded, thereby inflating the stated balance.

I therefore certify that if the Daily statement of the United States Treasury of October 23, 1915, had been made up on the same basis as that of August 4, 1913, the available balance in the Treasury would now be exhibited as $3,517,027.21.

The statement of January 16 shows that the deficit for the six months of the present fiscal year already amounts to over $60,000,000. Yet we have had an income tax—estimated by its authors to yield $82,000,000—in fact, yielding the first year $28,000,000; a war tax, yielding about $80,000,000 a year; and large imports capable of yielding a fair percentage in customs. We have not even embarked upon our program of national defense, so the deficit can not be charged to the "preparedness" movement.

Nevertheless our Treasury is in a bad way—practically bankrupt, indeed, as we have seen. It is a few dollars ahead of zero one day, a few dollars behind zero the next. Can it be said that Mr. UNDERWOOD's promise that his law would yield ample revenue has been realized?

But it is important to know why the virtual bankruptcy has come about. There are two ways by which a party can play ducks and drakes with the finances of the country: First, by decreasing the revenues, and second, by rolling up the expenses.

We have seen, perhaps at sufficient length, just how and to what extent the Democratic tariff has reduced revenues in spite of the fact that imports were, during the war, of about normal Republican volume.

But how about our expenditures? The Democratic Party came into power on a platform pledging it to strict economy. Yet the Congress which died—unwept, unhonored, and unsung—last March appropriated $177,000,000 more than any Republican Congress in history. This is ancient history. I do not care to spend much time on it. I should, however, like to quote the words of that able Democrat, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. FITZGERALD]:

[CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 63d Cong., 2d sess., pp. 6553–6554, Apr. 10, 1914.]

In a few months I shall be called upon in the discharge of my official duties to review the record that this Democratic House shall have made in its authorization of the expenditure of the public moneys. Whenever I think of the horrible mess that I shall be called upon to present to the country on behalf of the Democratic Party I am tempted to quit my place.

If I placed my political fortunes above my sworn duty under the law, I would not attempt to carry out the promises of the Democratic platform, but I should place myself at the head of this band of Treasury looters upon every occasion.

They have unnecessarily piled up the public expenditures until the Democratic Party is becoming the laughing stock of the country.

And also the forceful statement of his colleague on that committee [Mr. SISSON]:

[CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 63d Cong., 2d sess., pp. 6209–6210, Apr. 3, 1914.]

We are writing ourselves down in the history of the country as being the most outrageously and the most criminally extravagant Congress that ever sat on the American Continent. I said this in a speech before, in the last session, and when I made that speech Members of the Democratic House came to me and asked me not to put it in the RECORD, because it would be used by the Republicans in their campaign book. Let them use it. * * * You may use that statement now, gentlemen, because when Democrats get to be so violently extravagant that it makes our record look bad as compared to the very wicked record of the Republicans I must apologize to you Republicans for having ever used the words "criminally extravagant" in criticizing the appropriations that you made, for if that expression, "criminally extravagant" was proper to apply to you, my God, the English language has never found an adjective strong enough to apply to Democratic extravagance.

It is, then, because of the combination of reduced revenue, as a result of the application of low-tariff theories, and grossly inflated expenditures that the Treasury finds itself in the worst financial plight since the Civil War.

Extraordinary taxes will be levied, no doubt, more and more, to meet the legitimate increases of Army and Navy. Sound financing of the program would require simply the elimination of all useless extravagances and the resumption of a fair duty on imports. If we do these two things, we need not continue our vexatious war tax, and yet we shall have ample funds to put into effect any reasonable preparedness program.

What do the estimates furnished at the convening of this Congress indicate as to the expenditure policy of the administration for the ensuing fiscal year? The Army and Navy estimates naturally and properly show a very large increase over last year's corresponding estimates. With this I have no fault to find. But the striking and saddening feature of the situation is that the estimate of every department of the Government shows a decided increase over that submitted to Congress in December, 1914, in spite of the fact that those estimates were at the time the largest in our history. The administration thus indicates, by recommending increases aggregating some $45,000,000 outside the preparedness items, no disposition whatever to curtail the ordinary "household" expenses of the Government, but, on the contrary, an apparent determination to plunge us still deeper into the financial quagmire. With a bankrupt Treasury, with customs revenues averaging only 10 per cent on imports, the Democratic Party shows no intention, no desire even, "to cut the garment to the cloth," but, instead, is determined to rush headlong into wilder and more desperate extravagances.

I am proud to number among my most valued friends very many members of the Democratic Party both within and without the House of Representatives. I accord to them the highest virtue, sincerity, and patriotism; nevertheless, I believe that certain of their economic doctrines are fundamentally mistaken and pregnant with danger for the Nation. In saying this I think I am not blinded by partisan bias; indeed, I am not stating my belief as strongly as do certain eminent Democrats holding high public office, some of whom I have already quoted in the course of my remarks. Let me quote from another and very recent speech of a distinguished and patriotic Democrat, Senator NEWLANDS, of Nevada. Much of what I have said to-day might be regarded as almost a paraphrase of his remarks. Speaking in the Senate on January 11 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 921) he said, in part:

Since the commencement of the Civil War, a period of 65 years, the Democratic Party has been in power nationally only 11 years, and of that period only 4 years consecutively, in every instance losing power as the result of the fear or the resentment of the business classes with their accompanying conditions of unemployment, which made most potent with the workingman "the full-dinner-pail" argument and caused them to reluctantly yield to the persuasion and coercion of our opponents.

We were in similar danger at the congressional election of 1914, a danger only averted by the European war.

* * * * * * *

The realization that similar prudence would keep us out of European complications saved the Democratic Party at the last election from the defeat which would have surely come as the result of the general prostration of business, popularly attributed to our economic legislation.

* * * * * * *

An industrial and commercial depression has been experienced and has been coterminous with Democratic control of legislation. It would not do to charge this to the European war, first, because that war, though injurious to our production and trade in its inception, has since become a stimulant to production and export, and, second, because the commencement of this depression antedates the European war and was contemporaneous with our legislation regarding the tariff, banking, and trade.

The recent elections indicate that we will be in similar danger at the coming presidential election, unless the European war continues, and makes the President's sagacious and firm handling of our foreign affairs the overshadowing issue. But if that war soon comes to a close, and the manufacture of munitions ends, and added to this source of unemployment our markets now protected by the war from invasion are overwhelmed by the cheap products of the nations just emerging from war and eager to get back their gold, we may have not only an aggravated industrial depression to meet, but a financial condition fruitful of paralyzing caution. Such conditions may make the election turn not upon our foreign policy but upon domestic economic conditions, and the "full-dinner-pail" argument may again be potential.

* * * * * * *

It is safe to say that the manufacturing, the banking, and the large corporate interests are hostile to the Democratic Party, and that their employees are also preparing to throw their weight against it simply because its administration has not brought good times, but on the contrary has, in their judgment, brought bad times.

* * * * * * *

Regarding the tariff my general view was that the reduction on dutiable articles from an average of over 42 per cent to an average of less than 25 per cent was too great, taking away possibly the entire margin of profit and even more.

* * * * * * *

The effect of the tariff legislation was what I feared it would be.

* * * * * * *

While I accept my full share of responsibility for the tariff bill, which I with apprehension of immediate ill effect voted for, candor will not permit me to assert, as many of its supporters do, that world-wide causes were at the bottom of the general contraction of production following its agitation and passage. It is an indisputable fact that the paralysis came before the European war was inaugurated, and that its causes were mainly domestic.

Upon all the evidence, therefore, I am convinced that the rule of the Democratic Party in national affairs is disastrous to the country as a whole, and especially disastrous to a State like Massachusetts, which, in part, I have the honor to represent on this floor. I base this assertion upon two broad grounds:

First. Because its tariff policy is suicidal for any industrial population. Take the actual words of the Democratic platform of 1912:

We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government, under the Constitution, has no right or power to impose or collect tariff duties except for the purpose of revenue.

In other words, its historic economic theory, again promulgated in 1912, is that revenue, and not reasonable protection, should be the keynote of tariff making; that the European manufacturer should be actually encouraged to send to our markets the products of his mills and factories. Let me show by two recent illustrations what I mean. Secretary Redfield, as head of the Department of Commerce, is charged with the supervision of our foreign and domestic trade policy. In an official bulletin, sent out last autumn under the Government frank to practically every important newspaper in the United States, he says:

The Swiss legation at Washington has advices from Berne that manufacturers in Switzerland are anxious to supply the Christmas toy trade of the United States, and the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, of the Department of Commerce, has undertaken to assist in having orders placed. Some Swiss firms alone have produced hundreds of new models in wood and pasteboard and more are being added daily. A few of these samples which have reached Washington are skillfully executed lithograph soldiers of all the belligerent nations for the construction of little armies by American children.

Toy making is a considerable and a growing industry in the United States. The last census gives us the following statistics concerning it:

Toys and games.

[Census of 1909.]

	Massachusetts.	United States.
Number of establishments	16	226
Total employed	1,143	5,305
Capital	$1,103,596	.....
Total expenses	$1,564,503	.....
Wages	$446,792	.....
Value of product	$1,750,739	$8,264,135
Value added by manufacturing	$892,165	$4,709,897

New York, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania are the leading States in the industry, dividing over one-half the total production.

While, of course, not one of our great industries, it gives employment already to over 5,000 men. It requires no great experience, technical knowledge, or capital to make Teddy bears, rag dolls, or games. The industry is capable of being made one of the most productive and desirable in the country. Yet, in anticipation of the Christmas season, Secretary Redfield deliberately and officially states that the Swiss manufacturers—quite naturally—are "anxious to supply the Christmas toy trade of the United States," and that, in view of this, his department "has undertaken to assist in having orders placed." Can you imagine this occurrence under a Republican administration? And if you can, can you conceive that a Republican Secretary would boast of it? The Republican view is that our home industries should be protected, if they need such protection, and to the extent of their need, against foreign manufacturers, whether in Switzerland, Germany, Great Britain, China, or Japan.

Take another brilliant bit of advertising by Secretary Redfield. In Commerce Reports dated November 4, 1915, it is said, presumably with his approval:

Two visitors from Russia have nearly completed the organization of a cooperative sales agency for promoting Russian interests. Their efforts were materially assisted by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

Here it is "Russian interests" Secretary Redfield has "materially assisted," but the principle is the same as in the Swiss case. I submit that it is not a safe or sound policy for the American people.

Second. Democratic rule in national affairs is bad for an industrial State like Massachusetts, because the Democracy in Congress is dominated by the South and because the point of view of its leaders seems antagonistic to the even reasonable welfare of a manufacturing and mercantile population. I do not make this statement lightly or in any desire to stir up sectional disaffection. I make it on the authority of public utterances of the leaders themselves. By way of illustration, let me quote the familiar threat of the present majority leader, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]:

[CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 62d Cong., vol. 47, pt. 1, p. 279.]

We in the South intend to make the New England mills come down and put their mills there or else go out of business. [Applause.]

And also the more recent and very enlightening remark by Mr. KITCHIN's unsuccessful rival for the majority leadership, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], who is so influential on the Ways and Means Committee:

[Quoted from Boston Herald.]

We Democrats are in charge of the House, and I'll tell you right now every time one of those Yankees gets a ham I'm going to do my best to get a hog.

Doubtless we should all agree that it is desirable and wholesome to have two strong and fairly evenly balanced political parties in national affairs, each vigilant to protect the country as a whole from the mistakes or excesses of the other and each entirely national and nonsectional in scope and attitude. It is unfortunate that throughout the southern section of the country there is really no minority party, and that the Democratic Party reigns supreme. This situation tends to give rise to the point of view which I have just illustrated by quotations from two southern Democratic leaders. It is further illustrated by a statement of the present Attorney General of the United States, T. W. Gregory, of Texas:

The brutality and senselessness of the great wrong of reconstruction can not be forgiven or forgotten. It welded every element of the South into eternal opposition to a political party; it made adherence to that party moral, social, and political treason; it made it impossible for us to divide on any issues of expediency, or even of right and wrong; and, to sum it all up, it made it impossible for a southern born and bred man to vote the Republican ticket and go home and face his wife and children.

I have made a much longer speech than I had intended. Perhaps it could all have been said in a sentence. Again I quote from an eminent Democratic source, Senator JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, the former leader of his party in this body:

[CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 63d Cong., 2d sess., p. 6381, Apr. 8, 1914.]

The poor, dear, old foolish Democratic Party is going through the same game that she can be generally trusted to go through with soon after she gets into power.

That is the Democratic Party; that is its history; that is what led old Tom Reed to say in 1894 and 1895:

"You can not last long, because you are not accustomed to governing anybody or anything; you can not govern the country; you can not even govern yourselves; you are incompetent."

[Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Clerk to read the bill under the five-minute rule.

The bill was read.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

That the appointment of the nine delegates by the Secretary of the Treasury to represent the United States in the proceedings of the International High Commission to be held in Buenos Aires, Argentina, during the year 1916, in accordance with the action of the First Pan American Financial Conference, held in Washington during the year 1915, pursuant to the provisions of an act of Congress approved March 4, 1915, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916," be, and the same is hereby, approved and confirmed; such delegates shall be known as the United States section of the International High Commission and shall cooperate with other sections of the commission in taking action upon the recommendations of the First Pan American Financial Conference; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to fill any vacancies that may occur in the United States section of said international commission.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment: Strike out the words "Secretary of the Treasury" and insert the word "President" in line 17, page 2, of the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 17, amend the committee amendment by striking out the words "Secretary of the Treasury" and insert in lieu thereof the word "President."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill as amended to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 8235, and had directed him to report the same with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FLOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

IMPEACHMENT OF H. SNOWDEN MARSHALL.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina offers a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 110.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary in continuing their consideration of House resolution 90 be authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, to subpœna witnesses, to administer oaths to such witnesses, and take their testimony.

The said committee is also authorized to appoint a subcommittee to act for and on behalf of the whole committee wherever it may be deemed advisable to take testimony for said committee. In case such subcommittee is appointed it shall have the same powers in respect to obtaining testimony as are herein given to the Committee on the Judiciary, with a sergeant at arms, by himself or deputy, who shall attend the sittings of such subcommittee and serve the process of same.

In case the Committee on the Judiciary or a subcommittee thereof deems it necessary it may employ such clerks and stenographers as are required to carry out the authority given in this resolution, and the expenses so incurred shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives shall have authority to sign, and the Clerk thereof to attest, subpœnas for witnesses, and the Sergeant at Arms or a deputy shall serve them.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I would not wish this resolution to go through as a privileged resolution. I am in favor of the resolution, but I do not desire it to go through as privileged, and I suggest to the gentleman that he ask unanimous consent.

Mr. WEBB. If the Speaker does not think it is privileged, of course, I will ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. GARRETT. I am not even making a point of order, but merely suggesting this to the gentleman from North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution just read. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the House that the Committee on the Judiciary has had under consideration House resolution No. 90, which was referred to that committee probably some 10 days ago. The committee has not come to any conclusion yet on the resolution, but feels that it should ask the House for the authority to subpœna some witnesses before it that might throw some light upon the charges made. The resolution was unanimously adopted by the Committee on the Judiciary to-day, and I trust that it may pass and that the committee may secure the authority, which it will immediately exercise.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL PAGE.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 111.

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint an additional page for the remainder of the present session, to be paid for out of the contingent fund of the House, at a salary of $75 per month.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman explain what is intended by this?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The purpose of this resolution is this: One of our colleagues, as we know, suffers under the terrible misfortune of being blind, and it is the purpose of this resolution to create this additional page, who will be assigned to him to go with him to and from his office and about the Capitol here, in order to aid him in attending to his public duties. There are not sufficient pages on the roll now to have one of them detailed for his exclusive use, and this resolution is intended to serve that particular purpose.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, when the session commenced I asked the Doorkeeper to furnish a page to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] in the House whenever it was desired, and that has been done. But it does not answer the necessity. I quite agree with the gentleman from Mississippi that it would be very proper for the House to provide the additional page for the gentleman from Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Friday, January 28, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

FRIDAY, January 28, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we have come upon times in our national life and in the world life when we are driven to Thee for aid. An inheritance of honor and manhood makes us unafraid in conflict with men. Death has no alarm to us if it is the price of honor. We fear lest we should stand apart from Thee. Thy will is supreme. Thy law is over all.

We believe that Thou hast given to us a voice and a mission and a power among the nations of the earth. We pray Thee to lay tribute upon these that we may fulfill the Divine plan in us. Guide us this day in the discharge of the duties that are before us. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ARMY POSTS (S. DOC. NO. 261).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 27, 1916.

HON. JAMES M. BAKER,
Secretary Senate of the United States, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Referring to resolution by the Senate of the 6th instant, that the Secretary of War furnish to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interests, certain information with reference to Army posts in the United States, I have the honor to transmit herewith detailed information covering the first four items of the information requested. As to the fifth and sixth items, I am not now prepared to make specific recommendations on this subject, as the passage of any of the bills now before Congress looking to an increase in the Military Establishment would probably require the use of all Army posts now available.

Very sincerely,
LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire if this report will be published in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was just inquiring of the clerks at the desk the Senator who offered the resolution.

Mr. KENYON. I offered the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would inquire of the Senator from Iowa what is his desire as to the committee to which it shall be referred?

Mr. KENYON. I ask that it be published in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And referred to any committee?

Mr. KENYON. I think not.

Mr. SMOOT. Would not the printing of it as a public document do just as well, rather than to have the RECORD cumbered?

Mr. KENYON. I would prefer that, but I thought it might be more economical to publish it in the RECORD. I ask that it be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the communication and accompanying papers will be printed as a public document, and not in the RECORD.

COMMERCIAL FERTILIZERS AND COTTON PRODUCTION (S. DOC. NO. 262).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 11th instant, a statement relative to the amount of commercial potash, nitrogen, and phosphoric acid available for fertilizer purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the National Academy of Sciences for the year ended December 31, 1915, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORT OF WASHINGTON & OLD DOMINION RAILWAY (H. DOC. NO. 627).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Washington & Old Dominion Railway for the year ended December 31, 1915, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill

(H. R. 8235) to provide for the maintenance of the United States section of the International High Commission, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

RIGHTS OF NEUTRALS TO PURCHASE SHIPS OF BELLIGERENTS.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, when the interesting subject which engaged our attention yesterday morning was under consideration reference was made to the aggravating condition of our shipping interests. I am very glad this morning to call the attention of the Senate to a pleasant feature of that subject.

Yesterday morning there was a brief dispatch in the papers reading as follows:

BRITAIN ALLOWS PURCHASE OF GERMAN VESSELS UNDER CERTAIN CONDITIONS.

LONDON, January 26.

The British Government is allowing the transfer of German ships to United States registry under the condition that they are not to be used, directly or indirectly, for trading with enemies of England.

Lord Robert Cecil, undersecretary for foreign affairs, stated in the House of Commons this afternoon that the transfer of the German ship Pure Light to American registry had been sanctioned, as well as the transfer of the registry of 22 ships which were purchased by the Standard Oil Co.

It was announced by the British foreign office some time ago that the clause of the declaration of London relating to transfers of registry had been abrogated by England. This was followed by the seizure of vessels flying the American flag, but which had been German-owned before the war.

In the course of some remarks made by me on this subject a year ago, in a colloquy participated in by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], I said:

When the English representatives are brought face to face with the problem, and it is a question of a straight abandonment of the principle for which they themselves have been contending for a century and a quarter, and which during all that time has been regarded as consistent with their highest interests, I am not quite sure that they will not think again about it.

Furthermore, let me say to the Senator that I am not quite sure that by that time they may not reach the conclusion that it would be very much better to let us buy these German ships and add them to our mercantile marine than to have them go back to Germany after the war.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a telegram addressed to the Senate of the United States, which will be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The telegram was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram.]

NEW YORK, N. Y., January 27, 1916.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEE ON MEYER LONDON RESOLUTION,
The Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The undersigned organization has instructed me to urge your consideration of the resolution introduced by Hon. MEYER LONDON, of New York, calling for a peace congress of neutral nations.

Yours, for peace,
AMALGAMATED LADIES' GARMENT CUTTERS' UNION,
INTERNATIONAL LADIES' GARMENT WORKERS' UNION,
JOSEPH R. SCHEFLET, Secretary.

Mr. PHELAN. I present resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles, Cal., urging national and Pacific coast defenses, together with a memorial to Congress adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles, urging the necessity of the maintenance of a land force on that coast. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOS ANGELES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Los Angeles, Cal., January 22, 1916.

Resolution urging national and Pacific coast defense.

Whereas the United States is at present practically unprepared to defend itself against an attack by foreign force; and

Whereas the need for such defense may arise following the termination of the present hostilities now being waged among several of the great nations; and

Whereas the cost and consequences of an attack would be inconceivably greater than the cost of even the most elaborate preparedness for defense; and

Whereas the United States Government now has, in the organizations known as the General Board of the Navy and the General Staff of the Army, a highly trained and experienced body of military and naval experts whose opinion on these matters should be the best obtainable; and

Whereas it is our understanding that the plans and suggestions of these boards concerning immediate preparation have not been adopted: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the board of directors of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce:

First. That the United States Government take immediate steps to insure the prompt and successful defense of all of its territory.

Second. That the measures adopted to attain the above end should include complete and specific plans providing adequately for the defense of the Pacific coast, which should be formulated without delay by the General Board of the Navy and the General Staff of the Army of the United States, and which should give full consideration and weight to the facts and recommendations embodied in the attached memorial to Congress, which sets forth the conditions on the Pacific coast from which arises the urgent and imperative necessity for the establishment and permanent maintenance on that coast of a land force adequate for its defense.

Third. That the principle of universal military service by the entire manhood of the country, which is a true democratic system, should be adopted as the foundation for our ultimate system of national defense. Such service should be with the colors on the part of those physically fit, as provided for in the Federal Constitution, or else by financial contributions from those unable to serve in person, to be applicable solely to the military and naval services of the country.

I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of resolution passed by the board of directors of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce at the regular meeting held Wednesday, January 19, 1916.

ROBT. N. BULLA, President.

Attest:

FRANK WIGGINS, Secretary.

Memorial to Congress.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The facts and recommendations hereinafter set forth are respectfully submitted for your consideration in behalf of the people of the Pacific coast:

1. It must be conceded that no dependence can be placed on bringing naval reenforcements from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast in the event of war. The Panama Canal is uncertain. It easily could be blocked or its locks wrecked with dynamite prior to open warfare by any enemy of the United States. Unless a powerful fleet is kept constantly on the Pacific coast and is equal in fighting power to the combined navies of Asia, it would fail as an adequate defense measure. It would face destruction unless it was provided with fortified naval bases or harbors of refuge similar to those that have protected the navy of Germany in the present war.

2. However desirable it would be for the United States to have a fleet of superior fighting power on the Pacific Ocean, its construction would require many years. By no possibility could an adequate Navy for the Pacific be built in time to meet immediate necessity for an impregnable defense. It appears obvious that the need for such defense will arise, if ever, before the needed fleet could be constructed. For that reason such naval defenses as can be immediately provided for the Pacific coast should be not offensive but defensive in character, including naval bases, harbors of refuge, coaling stations with large reserve coal supplies, transports, swift cruisers, torpedo boats, submarines, torpedoes, mines, mine layers, and large fleets of aeroplanes, with ample ammunition and supplies at all bases.

3. Naval bases should be established immediately and strongly fortified at all vantage points on the Pacific coast in the United States and at Sitka, Cooks Inlet, Unalaska, Samoa, and Pearl Harbor. Unless both can proceed simultaneously, the establishment and fortification of these naval bases should take precedence over ship construction. Sea power on the Pacific depends on the possession of these naval bases, with an adequate fuel supply.

4. The defense of Alaska is vital to the safety of the Pacific coast of the United States, and necessitates the immediate creation and permanent maintenance of a land force in Alaska large enough to insure the safety of this territory. Such an Alaskan land force should include a construction reserve, in which could be enlisted all men employed in Government development work in Alaska, including the mining of coal to supply our naval coaling stations.

5. An Alaskan agricultural reserve should be established, in addition to the Alaskan construction reserve. This reserve should be created by a campaign for the colonization of the agricultural lands of Alaska under a system patterned after that of the New Zealand land settlement, which should be inaugurated immediately by the National Government. It should be so vigorously conducted as to establish speedily in Alaska a permanent population adequate for its protection in the event of war, and every settler should be trained as a reservist, as they are in Switzerland, Australia, and New Zealand.

6. Harbor fortifications should be built immediately for the protection of all cities and harbors on the Pacific coast, and such coast defenses should be at all times fully manned, and should be prepared against a land attack by the permanent maintenance of an adequate land force amply provided with field artillery and automobile transportion and the construction of the necessary military highways. The protection of cities must include the protection of their sources of water and food supplies.

7. The standing Army of the United States should be increased and provided with a reserve by the adoption of the plan proposed by the War Department, which contemplates the creation of a reserve for the Regular Army by a six years' enlistment, of which two years would be given to service with the colors and the remaining four years to the reserve. A separate force should be enlisted for colonial and isthmian service.

8. A national construction reserve should be established and permanently maintained, to embrace all men employed in construction work by the National Government, including the building of highways and waterways, flood prevention and protection, river regulation, forestry, and land reclamation. All such work should be done by a regularly enlisted and organized reserve, under civil control in time of peace and instantly ready for military service in the event of war. The German forestry system might well be the model after which such a national construction reserve should be patterned.

9. A national rural reserve, with an eventual strength of 5,000,000 men, should be created and maintained at proper strategic points in the United States under a system embodying the features of the Australian and New Zealand land-settlement systems. Each rural reservist should be settled upon a small tract of land, no larger than he can cultivate with his own labor with the help of his family. This entire rural reserve should be officered, trained, equipped, and organized so that in the event of war they would be as good soldiers as the reserves of Switzerland, who are at all times ready for instant military service.

10. All the national reserves of the United States should be continuously under the exclusive jurisdiction and control of the War Department in all matters relating to military training, equipment, organization, and service, and should always be prepared to join the colors without delay. That instant readiness of the national reserves for service in defense of the country would be our best safeguard against the breaking out of war. We might then rest assured that no nation ever would attack the United States, or attempt to invade or occupy any of its territory or possessions.

11. The most imperative need to insure the instant preparedness of the United States for national defense would be a full complement of officers for all the reserves, always in active command. All the national reserves should therefore be under command of officers promoted from the ranks or trained in military schools under the direction of the War Department. All such officers should be classed and ranked the same as officers of the Regular Army. Military schools should be established and maintained in different parts of the United States, where a sufficent number would be regularly trained to provide all the officers necessary for the national reserves. Many of the military posts are improperly located for their present use and should be transformed into such military schools. The plan now in operation in the Regular Army, under which men are, after examination, promoted from the ranks, should be made applicable to all branches of the national reserves.

12. National defense against a foreign invasion may become necessary before an adequate navy or fortifications can by any possibility be constructed, particularly on the Pacific coast, which would in that event probably be isolated immediately by the obstruction of the Panama Canal and the destruction of railroad lines through the mountains. This would make it impossible to transfer military forces or reinforcements or munitions or materials of war to the Pacific coast. It is for this and other reasons imperatively necessary that the entire land force required for the defense of the Pacific coast should be stationed and maintained permanently in the territory lying between the Cascade, Sierra Nevada, and Sierra Madre Mountains and the Pacific Ocean, or in the Colorado River Valley and the State of Nevada. Such a force could not safely be less than 100,000 men in southern California, or in the Colorado River Valley and Nevada; 100,000 in the San Joaquin Valley; 100,000 in the Sacramento Valley; 100,000 in Oregon; and 100,000 in Washington, a total of 500,000 men fully equipped and officered, thoroughly trained and organized, and ready for instant military service. They should be permanently stationed in the localities mentioned to obviate any necessity for transporting troops through or across the Tehachapi or Siskiyou Mountains. The Colorado River Valley and Nevada should be connected with the coast of southern California by several complete systems of military highways.

13. This urgent need for a separate national reserve, constituting a land force of 500,000 men on the Pacific coast, must be recognized, and it should be created by Congress without any delay whatsoever, with the same irresistible energy that would be put forth if it were certain that a foreign invasion of the Pacific coast would be attempted by either England or Germany with an Asiatic ally before the end of the year 1916. In no other way can the security of the Pacific coast against such an invasion be assured, and such security must not depend upon chance or good fortune. It must be made certain and without regard to cost, because the safety of the lives and homes of our people are involved as well as our continued occupancy of the Pacific littoral of the United States and all our Pacific possessions. The necessary appropriations should be made, and all the legislation required for the immediate establishment of a land force of 500,000 men for the defense of the Pacific coast should be enacted at the present session of Congress without delay.

14. It is not possible for a standing army adequate for Pacific coast defense to be permanently maintained on the Pacific coast. Neither is it possible to provide the necessary land force for such defense by either a State or National militia. The sparse population and inevitable isolation of the Pacific littoral in the event of war makes it imperatively necessary that the required land force should be established by Congress by the adoption of a plan for immediately recruiting such a force from the Nation at large. This can be done, and it can be successfully done in no other way than by supplementing the reserves provided under the plans of the War Department by the immediate enlistment and establishment of a national home-croft reserve, composed of 500,000 young men, preferably married men, who would eagerly grasp the opportunity for an enlistment of three years in such a reserve upon the terms and conditions hereinafter specified and set forth.

15. The men enlisted in this home-croft reserve first would be given the military training necessary to make of them as good soldiers as those in the regular standing army, and thereafter they would receive the daily military training necessary to keep them constantly ready for actual military service; but they would also receive all the training necessary to qualify them within the three years to be expert acreculturists and horticulturists. This latter training should include everything required for the intensive cultivation of the land, fruit, vegetable, and berry culture and the raising of poultry, pigeons, and rabbits, as well as community cooperation and organization. Every reservist, at the end of his three years of service, would have been scientifically trained in the art and science of the home-croft system of education and life. He would know how to get his living from 5 acres of land, and he should be entitled to a perpetual lease of such tract of land from the National Government on the expiration of his three years' term of service in the national home-croft reserve, on condition that he should be enrolled and continue his service as a reservist in the national rural reserve until 45 years of age.

16. The national home-croft reserve for Pacific coast defense should be enlisted and organized immediately and their military training begun without delay. While this preliminary training is being given them and the force is being organized the National Government should acquire 100,000 acres of land in each of the five localities above named in the States of California, Arizona, Nevada, Oregon, and Washington. These lands should be paid for by the issuance of Government bonds for the amount of the purchase price, as is done in New Zealand when the Government purchases land for subdivision and colonization. Each tract of land should be subdivided into acre home crofts. A house and all necessary buildings should be erected on each home croft, and roads, streets, waterworks, and sewers should be built. The cost of such improvements should be provided by a bond issue by the National Government, as is done under the Australian and New Zealand system of land reclamation and settlement. The capital invested would be more than represented by the increased value of the land with the improvements.

17. The home-croft reservists should be given the opportunity to do the labor required for the construction of all improvements on the land and should be adequately compensated for such labor. Each reservist, with his family, should have the right to the use and occupancy of a Homecroft during his term of service for three years under a lease similar to the perpetual lease system of Government land settlement in New Zealand, and should pay a rental that would cover the interest on the Government's entire investment, and a low amortization charge. An additional charge should cover the cost of educational instruction and training. Each reservist should be entitled to all the products from his Homecroft and all moneys realized from sales thereof, and no further compensation should be made to him for military service in time of peace, but when in actual service in time of war he should in addition receive the same pay as a soldier in the Regular Army.

18. The land force thus provided for Pacific coast defense should include an Infantry and Field Artillery force, and also the force necessary to fully man all coast defenses and fortifications on the Pacific coast. A Cavalry force adequate for all needs on the Pacific coast should be established on 10-acre farms in Nevada, under a plan modeled after the Swiss cavalry reserve system, on Government lands reclaimed and settled by the National Government under a plan similar to the land reclamation and settlement system of Australia. Such a Cavalry force could be made available not only for the defense of the Pacific littoral, but also if needed at any time for defense on either the northern and southern border of the United States, and should be large enough to fully meet those possible needs.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 3509) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue a deed to the persons hereinafter named for part of a lot in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 91) thereon.

Mr. SHIELDS submitted a report (No. 89) to accompany the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. McCUMBER, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3636) to amend section 3646 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as reenacted and amended by act of February 23, 1909, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 93) thereon.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 90) thereon. I give notice that to-morrow, if an opportunity is offered, I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

PROHIBITION IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. JONES. By direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia I report back, with amendments and without recommendation, the bill (S. 1082) to prevent the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 92) thereon. I ask that the bill may take its place on the calendar.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that as soon as practicable after the disposition of the so-called water-power bills, or at my first opportunity, I shall move to take up the bill which has just been reported by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BRIDGE ACROSS PEND OREILLE RIVER, WASH.

Mr. JONES. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 3144) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pend Oreille River between the towns of Metaline and Metaline Falls, in the State of Washington, and I submit a report (No. 94) thereon. This is a report on an ordinary bridge bill, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROOSEVELT ROAD, ARIZONA.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I introduce a joint resolution, and inasmuch as it involves an expenditure of money on forest reserves I think it appropriate that it should be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, rather than to any other committee of which I can now think. I therefore ask that the resolution, with the accompanying papers, be so referred.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 88) providing for the repair and rebuilding of Roosevelt Road in Arizona, lying largely within a forest reserve, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. OLIVER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $30,000 to grade and macadamize Portland Street from the intersection of Nichols Avenue SE. to Fourth Street SW., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAPP submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $238,024.08 for the relief of Prof. William H. Hart, principal of the Hart Farm School and Junior Republic for Dependent Children, as payment in full for services in the care and maintenance of certain wards of the United States, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

OPEN DOOR IN CHINA.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer a resolution, which I send to the desk and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The resolution (S. Res. 86) was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Whereas Japan has renewed its demands upon China by presenting certain imperative requests which are similar to those presented about one year ago, such requests being of that character that may result in the exercise by Japan of sovereignty over and in the territory of the Chinese Empire, and it may be an assumption of governmental jurisdiction exclusive in its rights and including certain powers embraced in such demands as will result in the sole right to Japan of trade, navigation, and commerce, which will close a portion of the Chinese territory and some of the Chinese ports to other nations; and

Whereas since 1899 the United States of America has proclaimed, and jointly with certain European powers has established, what is commonly called the open door in China through diplomatic means and by treaty, some of such powers so acquiescing in or declaring of such open-door policy are now at war; and

Whereas such open-door policy in China is designed to protect the commercial rights of American citizens as well as the citizens or subjects of the Governments of Europe, all of which are threatened to be impaired or destroyed by the demands made by the Government of Japan upon China, or the equal treatment of such citizens or subjects may be thereby impaired or destroyed: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the open door in China as heretofore declared, interpreted, and applied in behalf of the citizens of this country as well as the citizens or subjects of other countries so concerned is a necessary and vital element in the foreign trade of the United States; that the Senate looks with profound concern upon such demands of the Japanese Government, and will regard such pressure upon China in insisting upon such demands, if granted, as a restrictive act upon the commercial rights of the people of the United States and their Government, and to be in contravention of the assent of the Japanese Imperial Government expressed December 26, 1899; and be it further

Resolved, That the Executive, through its Department of State, be, and is hereby requested, to communicate through proper diplomatic channels the protest of the Senate and its declaration that it can not look with indifference upon the threatened abridgment of the rights of the American people and the Europeans concerned to an equality of treatment in trade, navigation, and commerce in China.

EMPLOYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. SHAFROTH submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 85), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-fourth Congress to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

PRINTING OF THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH (S. DOC. NO. 260).

Mr. CHILTON. I ask unanimous consent that the speech of the President before the Railroad Business Association at its banquet in New York last night be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

ADDRESS BY J. CRAWFORD BIGGS.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I hold in my hand an address delivered by J. Crawford Biggs, president, before the North Carolina Bar Association at Asheville, N. C., in regard to interference with courts. I ask to have it referred to the Committee on Printing, with a view to its publication as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

GENERAL MOTORS CO., DETROIT, MICH.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in the course of some remarks I made last week upon the Government manufacture of armor and munitions I used a statement furnished by the legislative reference bureau of the Congressional Library.

One of the items of the statement indicated that the General Motors Co., of Detroit, Mich., had received large contracts for war materials. I have a letter from the president of that company in which he very positively denies that suggestion. As I have been the innocent means, probably, of doing the company some injustice, and desiring that the correction shall be made as public as the charge, I ask that the letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENERAL MOTORS CO.,
DETROIT, MICH., January 21, 1916.

Hon. ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have just seen in one of the daily papers that in a recent speech in the Senate you referred to General Motors Co. as having profited by so-called "war orders." This statement was undoubtedly due to misinformation which you have evidently received.

General Motors Co. has never received one dollar from "war orders." It has no contracts for sales of automobiles or any other commodity for war purposes, and never has had any such contracts. It is true that our English branch sold a few trucks to the Red Cross Society for ambulances, but the order was comparatively small, taken in the ordinary course of business, and can not properly be called a "war order." The profit from this sale was only the usual profit which would be realized from any like contract in normal times.

If convenient for you to correct your statement before the Senate, we would greatly appreciate having you do so.

Assuring you of my personal esteem and regard, I remain,

Yours, faithfully,

C. W. NASH, President.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR HENRY CABOT LODGE (S. DOC. NO. 263).

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, on the 22d of this month my colleague [Mr. LODGE] delivered a very comprehensive address on preparedness before the National Security League. I ask that it may be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 8235. An act to provide for the maintenance of the United States section of the International High Commission was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

THE NAVY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, some days since I gave notice that this morning immediately following the routine morning business I should address the Senate. On yesterday, however, the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] gave notice that he would desire to address the Senate at this hour. I am very glad now to give place to him, intending, however, to address the Senate at the conclusion of his remarks.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to the Senator from Montana.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, of course everyone knows it is my duty—and I have tried the best I could to perform that duty since I have been chairman of the Naval Committee—to be familiar with conditions at the Navy Department. Imagine my astonishment when I read in the New York Sun of January 22 the following:

The fundamental defect of the Navy Department is that it has no brain, no competent military organization charged with the preparation of the fleets for war and with their conduct in war, and in consequence the Navy is being built and administered on a police basis and is not being efficiently prepared for war service.

Can any of you guess who made this woeful utterance, and where? George von L. Meyer, former Secretary of the Navy. The speech was made at the New Willard Hotel in this city recently before the National Security League, where many of those patriots who are zealously endeavoring to turn the Democrats out of office and get back in themselves had assembled for conference.

There is so much agitation in the public press and there are so many thousands of varying ideas and suggestions from all sources, that the public mind is becoming confused in regard to actual conditions, and there is danger that the Congress will be driven by clamor into rash and unwise actions. I flatter myself—whether it is true or not—that a large majority of my fellow countrymen have absolute reliance upon my integrity. They believe I will tell the truth if I know it. I therefore feel it to be my duty to make the speech I am now making in order to let the world know what I believe to be the exact conditions, and that I feel warranted in saying what I do in regard to the Navy and the Navy Department.

It behooves us all to be on the alert in regard to increasing our Navy and its adjuncts along all reasonable lines. The United States ought to have a navy second only to Great Britain. But we need not lose our heads and run wild in pursuing that object, and above all no one should be unjust and untruthful in criticisms of existing conditions.

I have served on the Naval Committee now upward of 20 years, and while I know less than I could wish, I flatter myself I have kept fairly posted about conditions in that Department.

Looking further, I found this paragraph in Mr. Meyer's speech:

Nothing demonstrates unpreparedness in the Navy more than shortage of personnel. To go on a war basis we are short about 2,000 officers, after employing all that are on the retired list, and about 45,000 men.

Mr. Meyer forgets, if he ever knew, that at the time he left the Navy Department the service was nearly 6,000 short of the authorized enlisted complement; that 46 per cent of the men discharged in good standing were then leaving the Navy, while 85 per cent are now reenlisting; that during his incumbency there were 10,360 desertions. Mr. Meyer needed men and did the best he knew how to get them, and yet he left the Navy nearly 6,000 short. Yet he has the cheek to hold his successor responsible for conditions which are due wholly to his own shortcomings as Secretary. How can he speak with authority on the Navy's present needs? Who is responsible for the shortage in officers, pray? Everyone knows officers can not be enlisted like sailors. It takes four years to make an officer, or the starting toward the making, for it requires that time to go through Annapolis and graduate, and it will take two or three years more of actual experience on shipboard to become as efficient as an officer ought to be. Is Mr. Daniels responsible because the Republicans in Congress failed to provide the cadets at Annapolis to graduate?

There are to-day 5,959 more enlisted men in the Navy than there were on March 3, 1913. Yet the expense of transportation of enlisted men has been reduced from $893,000 in 1912 to $615,000 in 1915, and the total expense of recruiting has been reduced fully 25 per cent.

In 1912 only 54 per cent of the trained enlisted men remained in the service after completing an enlistment and in 1915 85.5 per cent of such men were retained in service.

These figures tell their own tale, and no comment is needed.

It may be necessary to quarter midshipmen in tents, for the academy will be filled to overflowing if the recommendations of Secretary Daniels are adopted by Congress. The emergency is too pressing, in my opinion, to wait for any building program at all.

I myself would like to see three midshipmen for each Senator and Congressman instead of two. But surely no sensible, honest man can blame the present Secretary for the shortage in officers.

Not only has the total authorized enlistment long since been obtained, but there is a large waiting list.

I speak advisedly, for it is my duty to know and I do know, that there is less envy and jealousy among the naval officers and more efficient cooperation and coordination of the whole department than I have ever seen in it before. As against 10,360 desertions while Mr. Meyer was Secretary—so far about two and a half years—there have been only 4,375 since his successor entered office. With more men in the Navy by several thousand there have been fewer desertions.

The head of the Navy himself is not a pampered and petted darling of inherited wealth, but a red-blooded, upstanding, forward-looking American, who is a graduate in the hard school of experience and a practical man with wholesome ideas. His religion, in a political sense, is that the door of opportunity shall be thrown wide open so that every man may have an equal chance to rise as high as his hopes and merits entitle him to. I predict that Josephus Daniels will go down in history as one of the greatest Secretaries the Navy has ever had. Paying no attention to political or social influences, he has selected as his lieutenants as brilliant a group of officers as the naval service affords. It would take too long to particularize and point out their several achievements and merits.

Although the Navy Department has no "brains" since Von L. Meyer was forced to go by the people, there still remains Admiral George Dewey, admired throughout the world both for his ability as a naval officer and his thorough knowledge gathered in the school of experience of the Navy in all its details. His services in Manila Bay will never be forgotten by the American people. He illustrated to the fullest the skill and heroism of American commanders, commencing with John Paul Jones and coming down through the long list of naval heroes whom every American loves to honor—Decatur, Perry, Lawrence, Farragut, and a score of others. Their names illumine the brightest pages of our history, but the list is too long, and to call them would take too much time.

Full eight months before Mr. Meyer delivered his remarkable lament over the utter absence of concrete war plans there was established the Office of Naval Operations for the purpose of meeting exactly that need, and the duties and responsibilities and authority of the Chief of Naval Operations embrace all the advantages of an Americanized general staff without any of the dangerous disadvantages which Mr. Meyer would import from Prussia.

The Chief of Naval Operations is Rear Admiral William S. Benson, who is not known at all in the drawing-rooms in Washington or Newport, but is loved by all naval officers as a wise, careful, and painstaking officer, with a grasp of naval affairs second to none.

It is men like him who have really made the Navy what it is, not the butterflies of fashion who have used their social and political influence to get detail in Washington or command at sea.

We next come to a South Carolinian about whom I will brag a little, Rear Admiral Victor Blue, Chief of the Bureau of Navigation. His daring at Santiago in locating Cervera's fleet and his going around the city through the jungle signalized his bravery, which is only equaled by his modesty.

At the head of the Bureau of Ordnance is Rear Admiral Joseph Strauss, who has been identified throughout his naval career with that important specialty.

He completed the Government powder factory at Indianhead and was in charge of it when the first powder was made, and its rapid growth has been due largely to his brain and energy.

Rear Admiral David W. Taylor, who is Chief Constructor of the Navy, is a first-honor graduate of Annapolis and a postgraduate with first honors from the British college at Greenwich. He perfected the central line of fire adopted by all the navies in the world, and is considered second to none of his class in any navy.

At the head of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts as Paymaster General is a young man from my own State, Samuel McGowan; I would not brag on a South Carolinian unless he deserved it, but without his consent or knowledge I invite any Senator to visit his bureau at any time and if he can show me wherein it is not the most efficient bureau in the Government service to-day, excepting none, I will apologize for my remarks in regard to Mr. Meyer, and everybody knows how I would hate to do that.

The Surgeon General, Rear Admiral W. C. Braisted, made a report on conditions in the Japanese Army during the Russo-Japanese War which attracted the attention of medical authorities the world over, which certainly proved he has "brains."

Gen. George Barnett, Commandant of the Marine Corps, and Capt. Ridley McLean, the Judge Advocate General, have both done signal work in their special departments. Under the advice of Capt. McLean a great betterment of the entire penal system of the Navy has come about. The number of naval prisoners has been tremendously reduced. The laws of the country, as they affect the Navy, have been codified in a masterly way.

It would fatigue the Senate and take too much of my time to catalogue all the worthy and good naval officers in the department. I have only selected these because of the specially meritorious work they have done.

While Germany had already won second place, as shown in Von Meyer's first report, he never could persuade his party—he tried only half-heartedly—to grant money enough to recover the lost ground. His predecessor, Mr. Metcalf, told the country that we could not hold second place without more dreadnaughts, and Von Meyer's first report notified us that we were already displaced. His report for 1909, four years before his political demise, admits this. It is true the program he recommended that year was quite respectable in size, but his party associates who are now clamoring for the Democrats to make good Republican deficiencies in a naval program did not give him the money. So that it is proven beyond possibility of dispute that the Republican Party is solely responsible for our present status—lack of officers, lack of personnel, and lack of ships.

It makes a great difference whether one is on the inside looking out or whether he is on the outside looking in. When Mr. von L. Meyer was in authority, and must, perforce, answer to the American people for money spent by his department, he was whining about the "economical limit set for the Navy," and was using constantly such words as "the department recommends only." Now that he is on the outside, a partisan desirous of displacing the responsible administration, which is recommending a consistent and continuous building program such as was constantly urged upon Mr. von L. Meyer, he is assuming the attitude of a carping and unreasoning critic, finding fault with others who succeed where he himself failed.

The only act which signalized his incumbency as Secretary was the closing of a few navy yards and recommending the abandonment of others. He advised that "the navy yards at New Orleans and Pensacola be given up and that the Secretary of the Navy be authorized to make such disposition of the Government property under the Navy as may seem best. Both navy yards are entirely unnecessary for the service of the fleet." He closed the Port Royal yard absolutely and wanted to sell the land. The present Secretary has utilized the costly buildings there as a disciplinary barracks; and the result of more humane treatment of prisoners who have been court-martialed is shown in the decreased number of desertions. He abandoned the whole coast between Norfolk and Panama, in effect, and refused absolutely to do anything for Charleston except as a torpedo-boat base. The five yards in the stretch of 678 miles between Norfolk and Portsmouth were developed actively; and it apparently did not disturb his patriotism or conscience and convict him in his own mind of sectionalism and narrow vindictiveness, because he seemed to feel that the United States stopped at the Potomac River.

Before the ink dried on his commission he kicked out that sensible plan for navy-yard management perfected after four years' study and handling of navy-yard problems by his predecessor, Mr. Newberry. While Mr. Metcalf was Secretary Mr. Newberry was the wheel horse in the Navy Department as Assistant Secretary. Secretary Daniels has revived this plan and is carrying it out as best he can, and its reapplication naturally displeases Mr. Meyer.

In view of all these facts it is safe to predict that the name of Josephus Daniels will be held in grateful memory by the United States Navy long after Mr. von L. Meyer has been forgotten.

Some one has sent me two newspaper clippings, which are so meaty that I will read them myself. One is from The Rochester Herald, which is Independent in politics. It is as follows:

[From The Rochester Herald, an independent newspaper, Monday, Jan. 24, 1916.]

A FOUL BIRD.

The most conspicuous example of a bird befouling its own nest was that presented by George von L. Meyer in his address before the National Security Congress at Washington last Friday. Every sentence uttered by Meyer in criticism of the Navy was a slap at his own administration of the Navy Department, and of his own Republican predecessors, who turned over to a Democratic administration less than three years ago the fruits of 16 years of incompetent Republican management of that department.

If the country had not become thoroughly disgusted with investigations, it would welcome an inquiry into Republican disposal during those 16 years of the hundreds of millions of dollars appropriated by Congress for naval purposes. Our expenditures annually are double those of some of the foreign powers whose navies critics of the Meyer stripe affect to admire. The question is, Why did not Meyer and his predecessors produce something for the money? Evidently much of it was wasted. Who got it? Does Meyer know? If he does, he is rash indeed to publicly call attention to his own lack of proper administration of the office, by which criminal wastefulness was made possible.

The other clipping is from the Portsmouth Daily Chronicle, a Republican paper, and is as follows:

[From the Portsmouth Daily Chronicle, Monday, Jan. 24, 1916.]

Mr. George von L. Meyer, formerly the society head of the Navy, who has been petted at the Court of Russia and has held other society jobs, appeared before the Security League at Washington on Thursday night and stated that the Navy Department was without brains. Unless George is very careful he may be accused of taking the brains with him when he left. The American people do not worship the Von Meyer type of American citizen. If he had his way the real people of America would only be of his set. The Navy would be a whirling society affair with all the ships and their officers and families anchored permanently at Newport. The real Republican party would do well to box up one George L. von Meyer.

I suppose the editor remembered a couplet quite famous a half century or more ago—

Things have come to a pretty pass
When a man can't wallop his own jackass.

Mr. President, before closing this defense of the Navy Department against the wanton, repeated, and unjustifiable attacks of this Thersites I want to have read a letter which Admiral George Dewey wrote Secretary Daniels last May—May 14, 1915. While I am on my feet, I ask permission to have inserted as an appendix to my speech the letter of Secretary Daniels to President Garfield, of Williams College.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to have Admiral Dewey's letter read now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE ADMIRAL OF THE NAVY,
Washington, May 14, 1915.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I trust that you will be good enough to convey to the mayor and citizens of New York City my sincere regret at my inability to be present at the ceremonies incident to the review of the Atlantic Fleet, and my cordial appreciation of the hospitality they have shown in the reception of the officers and men.

On this occasion I recall with the utmost pleasure, the magnificent welcome I received in their great city upon my return from Manila on board the Olympia in September, 1899, and it is a source of deep satisfaction to know that the interest of our citizens in their great Navy has not diminished in the 16 years that have elapsed since that time.

The people of New York have just cause for pride in the fleet now assembled in their harbor. Not only is it composed of the finest and most efficient warships that we have ever had, but it is not excelled, except in size, by the fleet of any nation in the world. Our ships and guns are as good as any in the world; our officers are as good as any; and our enlisted men are superior in training, education, physical development, and devotion to duty, to those of any other navy. (As president of the General Board for the last 15 years, I can say with absolute confidence that the efficiency of the fleet has steadily progressed, and has never been so high as it is to-day.)

However, we need more ships, more officers, and more men, and should continue the wise policy of increasing the size of our Navy, which must ever remain our first and best line of defense. This defense unless adequate is impotent; and adequacy is not reached until the Navy is strong enough to meet on equal terms the navy of the strongest probable adversary.

Very sincerely, yours,

GEORGE DEWEY.

The honorable JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Secretary of the Navy, Washington, D. C.

APPENDIX.

THE PREPAREDNESS OF THE NAVY.

The progress made by the United States Navy during the past two years is reviewed by Secretary of the Navy Daniels in a letter to President Harry A Garfield, of Williams College. President Garfield a few days ago addressed the following inquiry to Secretary Daniels:

"I shall be obliged if you will have sent to me an authoritative statement concerning the present status of the Navy equipment of the United States. I wish to be in a position to meet the statements made by Representative GARDNER of Massachusetts, alleging that the United States is at present unprepared for military emergencies."

In reply to President Garfield, the following letter was sent:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., April 24, 1915.

"MY DEAR PRESIDENT GARFIELD: I am in receipt of your recent favor asking for 'an authoritative statement concerning the present status of the Navy equipment of the United States,' and take pleasure in complying with your request as far as is compatible.

"There are now in active service, fully commissioned, 225 vessels of all characters, which is 36 more than were fully commissioned when I became Secretary. There are also 101 vessels of various types, in reserve and in ordinary and uncommissioned, capable of rendering service in war. We have under construction and authorized 77 vessels (9 dreadnaughts, 23 destroyers, 38 submarines, and 7 auxiliaries) as compared with 54 vessels (5 dreadnaughts, 14 destroyers, 23 submarines, 3 gunboats, and 9 auxiliaries which were under construction on March 1, 1913.

"All the vessels enumerated, those in active service and those in reserve, are supplied with munitions of war. No navy makes public the quantity of ammunition and torpedoes, mines, and other implements of naval warfare which it keeps ready. It may be said, however, that within the last two years the quantity of all has been steadily and greatly increased. For example, we have increased the number of mines, on hand and in process of manufacture, by 244 per cent. With reference to torpedoes, the increase in two years has been 90 per cent. By the enlargement of the naval powder factory we shall soon be able almost to double its former capacity, and like enlargement of the torpedo works and the equipment of a plant to construct mines will still further increase, at decreased cost, the quantity of such stock, and the possession of these plants in times of emergency will enable the department to be in a better state of preparedness as regards the supply of ammunition than ever before.

"The personnel of the Navy is at present composed of 4,355 line, staff, and warrant officers and 53,171 enlisted men. Increases in the number of officers are dependent almost entirely upon the output of the Naval Academy, admission to which is restricted by statute. The number of enlisted men also is restricted, and the Navy is to-day recruited to the maximum strength allowed. There are now with the colors 5,824 more men—an increase of 12 per cent—than were on March 1, 1914.

"My professional training as a journalist has always inclined me to the conviction that any officer, within the prescribed limits recognized in the Navy, should feel free to express his opinion in regard to matters in the service; and there is not an officer who commands a ship to-day who could or would say that his ship, without or within, was not as good as it was two years ago, or that the officers who command it and the crews who man it are not as thoroughly disciplined, sober, loyal, and efficient as they were two years ago, or as they ever had been.

"The Atlantic Fleet has just returned from Guantanamo, where it has for many years held its annual winter practices. This year more battleships and destroyers have participated in the maneuvers, and for a longer period, than ever before.

"Under the direction of Admiral Fletcher, upon plans evolved at the Naval War College and approved by the department, the fleet has been busied in tactics to try out its efficiency and readiness. All reports tell of the enthusiasm of officers and men in this practice and the splendid record made by the ships. The fleet is now in Tangier Sound and on the southern drill grounds, where it will be busy in target practice until May, when it moves to New York for a week's well-earned leave. Then will come the review at New York, followed by maneuvers in Narragansett Bay region, and finally the review in Hampton Roads prior to sailing through the Panama Canal to the Pacific en route to the exposition at San Francisco.

"These spring practices followed close upon the heels of valuable maneuvers and tactics in October, November, and December last. This was indeed strenuous practice, but it is the way the Navy is kept fit and ready, and the new admiral in command of the fleet and the department planned such extensive evolutions because the only way that the Navy can be always prepared is by practice and practice and then more practice. This simple statement of the operations of the fleet since October is one of the best answers I can give to your question as to the Navy's preparedness. The necessity of keeping ships in Mexico last year denied Admiral Badger the opportunity for as long practice as he had wisely planned, but the sudden call for the expedition to Vera Cruz demanded and exacted unusual service, to which the fleet responded with an alacrity and readiness which amply justify the faith of the country that there exists to-day no more efficient institution than the United States Navy. Some critics have said the efficiency of the fleet was reduced by reason of going to Vera Cruz. To our regret, certain maneuvers and target practice of value were necessarily omitted. The emergency experience, however, of a year of stress and strain was of far greater value in one important respect than the well-planned routine, because it gave a demonstration of the readiness of the Navy in every department, afloat and ashore, to meet an urgent call. Its flexibility was shown in adjusting itself to entirely new and unexpected situations, as well as its remarkable adaptability in handling every problem presented to it.

"It must be conceded by all that the best school and preparation for war is war itself, and it was almost under this condition that our fleet acted in proceeding almost in a day to Mexican waters. The stay at Vera Cruz, however, did not prevent practice, for the ships individually or in divisions, during a great part of the time held tactical maneuvers, torpedo-proving practice and subcaliber drills in preparation for target practice.

"For many years officers have written and talked about the formation of advance base material and the practice of exercising landing parties of seamen and marines in the use of this important adjunct to naval warfare. Congress appropriated money for this important plan of campaign, but never until January of last year was the Navy thus exercised. There had been plenty of talk, but not until January of last year was it undertaken. Then, under instructions from the department, Admiral Badger carried out a comprehensive exercise in which the professional advantages gained by officers and men were inestimable. Three months after this extensive practice had been given for the first time in our Navy, the same fleet, and the same men were called upon to land at Vera Cruz, and in the taking of that city the Navy carried out under fire what had been learned at Culebra.

"These details are given because every man knows that the efficiency of the Navy depends upon constant practice, but nobody in the Navy thinks anything like perfection has been reached, and constant study and work are pursued with the aim of continued improvement. If the fleet was efficient in any degree before Admirals Badger and Fletcher carried out the drills thus detailed, it is much more efficient to-day, and it will be made more ready every year. All that capable and trained officers and men can do to accomplish this steady improvement is being done. Only the uninformed or the partisan deny the steady improvement of the past two years, thanks chiefly to Rear Admiral Badger and Admiral Fletcher.

"But, you say, how about equipment and preparation for military emergencies? What has been done since Wilson's inauguration to make the Navy stronger in ships, in ammunition, in mines, in torpedoes? These questions are of the utmost importance. Let me answer them briefly:

"First, as to ships: During the last two years of the Taft administration Congress authorized the construction of two dreadnaughts to cost about $13,000,000 each. During the first two years of the Wilson administration, upon my recommendation, Congress authorized the construction of five dreadnaughts to cost about $14,000,000 each. Stated in dollars, the Wilson administration, in its first two years, authorized $70,0000,000 to be spent on the chief fighting force of the Navy as against $26,000,000 authorized during the last two years of Taft's; stated in numbers, it authorized five dreadnaughts instead of two; and stated in effectiveness, the five dreadnaughts authorized under Wilson will mount 36 more 14-inch guns than the two authorized under Mr. Taft.

"Second, as to submarines: These wonderful agencies of war have astonished the world in the present European conflict. The Sixty-third Congress, elected with Wilson, adopted my recommendation to give us all the money it could for submarines. It ordered the construction of three sea-going submarines, the largest ever authorized by any country, and 23 submarines of the same size and type which have done such fearful execution in the present war. These submarines will cost $16,260,000. Now what was done during the last two years under Taft? Twelve submarines, to cost $7,958,936, were authorized. Some of our submarines are not as perfect as they should be, nor are the submarines of any other nation. Under the administration, however, the board of inspections has adopted stricter tests before accepting submarines from contractors. Nobody has as yet perfected a satisfactory engine or satisfactory battery for submarines. Upon my invitation, Mr. Edison, last year, at the New York Navy Yard, went down into a submarine and closely studied its every feature. He thinks he has a battery that will meet the need. Our tests at the Brooklyn Navy Yard cause us to believe Mr. Edison has the right principle. Without waiting for the completion of his battery, he has been given an order for two, one to be put into an old submarine, accepted before March 4, 1913, whose battery does not give satisfaction, and one for a new submarine which I have ordered built in the Portsmouth (N. H.) Navy Yard. Private firms building submarines have not given entire satisfaction. We have equipped the Portsmouth Navy Yard to build submarines, and by competition between private and Government construction it is hoped that every obstacle may be overcome.

"Third, as to torpedoes: A statement has been put in circulation that the Navy is not making adequate provision to supply itself with torpedoes. The only answer I can make is to state the fact that we either have on hand or have placed orders for all the torpedoes the General Board prescribes. Is this administration going backward in this respect? It would not be proper to make public the number of torpedoes we have on hand, but this much may be said: For every 100 torpedoes which the department had on hand in March, 1913, 96 more are completed or in course of manufacture. Therefore, within a few months, the supply of torpedoes will be almost doubled. Upon my recommendation Congress has enlarged the torpedo plant at Newport, R. I., more than trebling its capacity, and the cost of manufacturing torpedoes has been reduced from $4,202.11 to $3,245.71 each. The reduction has already effected a saving of $326,700.

"AS TO MINES AND MINING.

"During the last two years unprecedented progress has been made in the expansion of our mining equipment. This was begun and was well under way before the last Congress met. The Navy is not, as many suppose, charged with the mining of our harbors. That is a function of the Army. The extent of the mining operations of the Navy is confined to the immediate vicinity of the fleets and such mining as may be necessary on the high seas. For the execution of this work and a further study and development of mines and mining the Navy now has three ships: The San Francisco and Baltimore, mine layers and mine-depot ships, and the Dubuque, mine-training ship. The general board as early as 1908 recognized the need of mine-depot vessels and recommended the conversion of two old cruisers for this purpose. The same year Congress authorized the conversion of the San Francisco and Baltimore. Work was started on the San Francisco June 12, 1908, but was not completed until December 2, 1911. Work on the Baltimore was not started until April 5, 1913, and was completed April 1, 1915. As to mine sweepers, a division of seagoing tugs and a division of torpedo boats have recently been equipped with mine-sweeping gear, and the destroyer tender carries mine-sweeping gear for a division of destroyers operating with the fleet. Additional gear is being supplied. At Pensacola during the winter the San Francisco and submarine flotilla have been operating jointly in mining exercises. The department has begun the manufacture of mines and in a short time will have 31 mines for every 9 it had two years ago, increasing our stock 244 per cent. By manufacturing mines at a Government station in lieu of purchasing them a saving of $178,750 has been effected.

"AS TO GUNS.

"The bureau of ordnance has developed a 14-inch gun that will shoot farther, shoot straighter, and hit harder than any gun now in use or known to be designed by a foreign country. Based upon former and current prices in contracts for guns and gun forgings we have saved $280,425.33.

"AS TO POWDER.

"Upon my recommendation, Congress increased the capacity of the navy powder factory at Indian Head. When the extension now under way is completed, the capacity will be nearly doubled. The cost of manufacture has incidentally been reduced 2.7 cents per pound, saving already in the cost of powder since manufactured, $150,000.

"AS TO RADIO.

"Radio has at last been successfully installed on submarines and more than 75 other ships, which either had no radio or whose equipment was obsolete, have been supplied with modern equipment. Three entirely new shore stations have been added to the chain: Balboa (Canal Zone), Great Lakes, Ill., and Tutuila, Samoa.

"AS TO AIR CRAFT.

"The European war has emphasized the value of air craft. The Navy has lagged behind in this instrument of war. Last year I appointed a Board of Aviation. It recommended the utilization of the abandoned navy yard at Pensacola as a training and repair station for aviation, and an Aviation Bureau in the department. This has been done. Upon my earnest recommendation Congress appropriated a million dollars to begin upon an elaborate plan the real development of aviation in the Navy. It also approved my request to pay aviators an increase of 50 per cent, and we are organizing a class of capable aviators. To make immediately effective this feature, three new hydroaeroplanes have just been purchased, which is but the beginning of the work of aviation, now well advanced along the lines of a well considered plan. I regard this as one of the most far-reaching steps taken by the Wilson administration.

"AS TO SAVINGS EFFECTED.

"All this unprecedented increase in the Navy has been secured, too, without large increase in appropriations. How? By avoiding unnecessary expenditure ashore, by reducing the cost of work ashore while maintaining its quality, and reducing appropriations for enlargement of shore stations, by securing real competition, and by economy. During the four years of Taft, $21,928,572 was appropriated by Congress for the public works alone of shore stations. Two naval bills have been passed by the present administration, and they carry together, for the public works of shore stations, a total of $3,920,880. We have greatly reduced expenditures ashore and greatly increased them afloat and the above figures attest the change for the better. When I became Secretary, ships could be built in only two navy yards. We have equipped or are equipping five additional navy yards for the construction of navy craft, and this is being done while at the same time there is a big decrease in appropriations ashore. By securing competition, I saved $1,077,210 in one contract for projectiles. Up to date, by first rejecting all bids and demanding more reasonable figures, I have saved $1,110,084 in the purchase of armor plate, securing lower prices than my predecessor secured. In two other bureaus alone last year, $1,800,000 was saved—more than enough to enable Congress to reappropriate one million of the savings for aviation and the balance for submarines. There has been the same character of savings in other ways—too many items to enumerate. So much for the material and preparation. Of course, we need constantly to increase the ships and armament, but the increase in the past two years, larger than in any previous two years in the history of the country, is an earnest of what will come in the regular and orderly and necessary increase of naval equipment.

"AS TO PERSONNEL.

"But of what worth is a ship without well-trained men? What has the Wilson administration done as to personnel? It is a pleasure to tell you that for the first time in years the enlistment is up to the limit prescribed by law and part of the year we have had a waiting list. Since I became Secretary of the Navy we have increased the enlistment 5,824 men, enabling us to commission fully 20 submarines, 4 battleships, 4 destroyers, 6 gunboats, 6 cruisers, and 3 monitors, increasing the total number of commissioned vessels by 41 over the number commissioned on March 1, 1913. I regard this as a great achievement, particularly since the Navy had not formerly been able to secure enough men to fill the quota. It has been secured, too, without letting down the standard for admission, which has been maintained and even raised. For every recruit accepted five were rejected because they did not come up to our high standard. To what is the increase of our enlistments attributed? The answer is easy: To the establishment of schools, opportunity to see the world, and for promotion afforded enlisted men hitherto denied them. In these two years 13 enlisted men have been appointed as assistant paymasters, 5 as midshipmen at Annapolis, and 12 as ensigns. It is true that prior to the Wilson administration it was possible for an enlisted man to be promoted to be ensign, but in the four years of the Taft administration only 3 were promoted, while in the two years of the Wilson administration 11 have qualified. How does this happen? The new policy of education and assistance was put into operation in 1913. Now every ambitious and aspiring young enlisted man is given special instruction when he desires it. Upon my recommendation, Congress passed an act which gives all the positions of pay clerk to these enlisted men who can qualify. This opens 200 more places to enlisted men. It is true to-day as never before that a boy may enlist in the Navy and by the display of ability be promoted to the grade of Admiral. Not only has the enlistment been increased by 5,824 new recruits, but Congress gave us the best reserve bill any nation ever put upon the statute books. While reenlistments have increased 12 per cent, desertions have decreased 17 per cent. Another incentive to enlistment is the new policy which leaves an open door to young men to retire from the Navy other than through the door of the prison, and likewise the modern methods of treating men who have violated rules.

"ABLE EXPERTS SELECTED.

"With special emphasis, I beg you to ask any well-informed man in or out of the service as to the ability and capacity of the various officers whom I have called as advisors and to the heads of the bureaus. You will find that the man selected in each bureau is recognized, both in our own and foreign navies, as an able expert in his line.

"One word more: For years there has been an unsuccessful insistence that Congress should reestablish the grades of Admiral and Vice Admiral. I earnestly urged the last Congress to create these positions. It authorized three of each. Now American naval officers, while abroad, will no longer be outranked by officers of nations with insignificant navies.

"I have answered your questions at some length. There are two reasons for the length of my letter:

"1. Because these two years have been epoch-making in the Navy, distinguished by more wise and progressive naval legislation and more practical achievement than any previous like period (thanks chiefly to a patriotic Congress), and

"2. Because certain persons, ignorant of their ignorance, and for selfish partisan reasons, have busied themselves with misrepresenting the true condition of the Navy, thereby causing some good people to fear that the Navy is not now, as in the past, the strong effective right arm of the Republic. All who would learn the truth may be assured that the Navy of 1915 is larger, better equipped, and in better condition than in any previous year, and that the fleet is becoming more efficient with every passing month. 'We shall take leave to be strong upon the sea in the future as in the past,' declared President Wilson in his message to Congress; and in the interest of the self-respecting peace, which is the only peace worth preparing for, it is devoutly to be hoped that this strength may not be questioned by others or endangered from within. The record above outlined shows that what President Wilson promised for the Navy has been fulfilled.

"Sincerely, yours,

"JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
"Secretary of the Navy."

INTERFERENCES WITH AMERICAN TRADE ABROAD.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, on October 21, 1915, the Department of State transmitted to our ambassador at London, for presentation to the British secretary for foreign affairs, a lengthy note setting out the attitude of our Government concerning the Order in Council of date March 11, 1915, and referring in more or less detail to impediments to which neutral ships plying to and from our ports have been subjected. It was in the nature of an omnibus protest, embracing, or at least alluding, to whatever controversies were then pending growing out of interferences, or threatened interferences, on the part of Great Britain with ships carrying our commerce, pursuant to or as a part of her war policy and operations. A schedule was attached classifying the various ways in which such ships had been harassed and annoyed—specific instances, the names of the ships and the dates of the incidents being given in illustration. Omitting particulars, this indictment was as follows:

First. Vessels whose cargoes and papers have been of such a character as to require but brief time for examination have been held in British ports, according to this Government's information, for prolonged periods, in some instances for more than a month, and then released without the institution of prize-court proceedings.

Second. Vessels have been held until they have reconsigned their cargoes to a consignee in a neutral country designated by the British Government.

Third. Detentions have been made without evidence amounting to probable cause.

Fourth. Vessels have been held, according to statements of the British Government, because of the manner in which shipments have been consigned.

Fifth. Goods have been seized by the British Government on the ground, as this Government has been informed, that the country to which they were shipped had not prohibited export.

Sixth. The British authorities have repeatedly seized articles classified as contraband, articles classified as conditional contraband, as well as noncontraband goods, shipped to Scandinavian countries, to the Netherlands, and to Italy, then neutral, although the reexportation of such commodities from these countries had been forbidden.

Seventh. Detentions have been made pending assurances that embargoed goods would be allowed to pass through a neutral country to Great Britain's allies.

Eighth. From time to time this Government has been informed of the seizure of cargoes on the ground that consignees have been known to trade with the enemy or because they were suspected of doing so.

Ninth. Vessels have been seized and brought into port and have been required by the British authorities to pay pilotage, harbor, unloading, warehouse, storage, or other dues, costs, and expenses in advance of a judicial determination of the validity of the seizure of vessel or cargo.

Tenth. Detention of vessels proceeding from European ports.

The last count was made more definite by the following recital in the bill of particulars:

The steamer Neches, which sailed from Rotterdam to the United States, was brought to London and compelled, in June last, to discharge cargo on the ground, apparently, that the goods originated partly in Belgium. The vessel was detained about a month, and, after having been damaged to the extent of approximately £1,500, as a result of a collision with another vessel while under the control of the British Admiralty, and after having been involved in litigation growing out of such collision, was allowed to proceed.

After the lapse of nearly three months no answer has been received to the communication of our Government which assailed the Order in Council as violative of its sovereignty and the practices of which it complained as lawless and indefensible.

It is quite to the credit of our people that no clamor arose concerning the aggressions of which the note makes mention, and others no less flagrant occurring since it was dispatched, while every effort was being made to exact compliance by the central powers with the laws of nations touching the safety of our citizens traveling the high seas in belligerent ships and to compel reparation for the lives of those lost by the wanton disregard of such laws.

Happily, those differences are in course of adjustment in a way which will leave unimpaired the principle that the lives of travelers on the high seas, sailing in unarmed merchant ships, may not be put in jeopardy by a belligerent whatever may be the emergencies of war. So much at least is saved out of the wreck of the system of international law.

It is scarcely worth debating whether such results as have been achieved were induced by our representations and protests, or whether, as has been querulously advanced, the submarine operations of the offending powers had been rendered ineffective by the activity of their enemies, whose naval successes disposed the former to make a virtue of necessity. It is enough that the principle involved has been acknowledged and is preserved. The public mind may now very well be directed to the controversies pending with Great Britain, growing out of her efforts to reduce her adversaries through her command of the seas, without due regard, as our Government asserts, to the rights of neutrals, the preservation of which has devolved upon us as a duty to civilization which we can not honorably avoid.

AMERICAN MISREPRESENTATION OF AMERICAN PRECEDENTS.

A disposition is noticeable on the part of certain journals of more or less influence to stigmatize any criticism of the acts and policy involved in the pending negotiations with the British foreign office as prompted by sympathy with Germany, and to characterize anyone who might venture modestly to champion the position our State Department has felt obliged to assume as a "hyphenate" willing to embroil our country in war that the cause of another nation may be advanced. These aspersions may be dismissed without comment. They may gain some favorable notice for their authors among those in whose interest they are made. It is inconceivable that any public servant should be deterred from uttering his convictions or from acting in accordance with them in consequence of such comment.

More serious is the persistent assertion on the part of the same class of publications that the aggressions concerning which such vigorous protest has been made are fully justified by the course our Government pursued during the Civil War. This heresy is so inveterate as to defy both history and reason. The inculcation of it is particularly vicious at this time, when, as always in the case of international complications, the Nation ought to give loyal support, if possible, to its authorized representatives.

"Our country, may she always be right, but right or wrong, our country," is a very proper sentiment for an officer of the Navy. It can not be commended as one generally to be harbored, but the patriotic citizen will at least give his country the benefit of the presumption that she is in the right. He may well leave it to her enemies to distort the law and misrepresent the facts to put her in the wrong.

If, in the general sweeping assertion that the course of Great Britain in the present war touching neutral ships is in accordance with practices we ourselves observed or originated, any attempt is made to particularize, it is declared that we blockaded the ports of neutral countries which were gateways for the admission of goods to and the passage of goods from the States of the Confederacy, likewise in a state of blockade, and that our courts devised and our Navy applied the doctrine of "continuous voyage," which, it is assumed, is now being combatted by our Government. For the present it will be sufficient to say that we never did blockade and never pretended to have blockaded any neutral port during the Civil War or at any other time, and no one in authority in this country has questioned the right of Great Britain to apply the doctrine of "continuous voyage" in all its vigor to commerce ostensibly neutral, or intimated the impropriety of her doing so.

A newspaper that goes into the hands of nearly every Member of Congress daily printed a few days since an editorial, from which the following is taken:

"This newspaper has repeatedly pointed out that conditions, as affecting American trading privileges, would be much worse if the London admiralty would apply literally the rules laid down by the United States in Civil War times.

"There has been manifest indisposition at London to go so far as the United States then went. But this mildness has not been appreciated by anti-British agitators, and it is now proposed that the full rigors of American Civil War procedure be enforced against commerce destined or suspected of being destined to neutrals. If that be done, the blockade will be more effective, and at the same time more easily defended as against American criticism.

"The Northcliffe newspapers are prominent in demanding this change of policy by the British Government. What it means has been set forth in this paper repeatedly. The London Mail now presents the matter from the British viewpoint, thus:

"'The British nation is now face to face with the fact that the so-called blockade of Germany is a sham. The evidence gathered by Basil Clarke and the admissions of Lord Lansdowne supplement each other. If the war is to be won, the blockade must be tightened and made a reality. If the blockade is to be tightened, there is only one way—put the admiralty in charge, let the sailors take the necessary action, and let the foreign office stick to its proper business of explaining the sailors' business to neutral states in soothing and dignified terms.

"'From New York the warning reaches us that fresh protests against the present half-hearted blockade are expected from the United States. If the allies are wise, they will lose no time in putting the blockade on an American basis, so that American legal rulings and precedents may be cited in our behalf. The first step is for Great Britain, France, and Russia jointly to declare a blockade of the entire German coast.

"'The editorial instances the allied submarine activities in the Baltic as removing the greatest difficulty in the path of the blockade and says that the extension of the list of contraband is a matter of extreme urgency.'"

It quotes then, again, from the London paper:

"There is good American precedent for this. In the case of the Confederacy the United States seized all cotton, contending that it was as much munitions of war as powder and ball, for it furnished the chief means of obtaining these indispensables of warfare. The more widely the contraband list is drawn the better, as the American Supreme Court has allowed a cargo when contraband to be seized on suspicion, even though on a neutral ship bound to a neutral port. By taking these steps we place the blockade strictly on a legal footing, and acting on the advice of our best friends, the United States, who for months have been asking in wonder why we do not proclaim a blockade.

"If there must be friction with neutrals—and the sham blockade has generated this as much if not more than the real article would have done—let us make certain that the precedents are on our side. Then we can point out that it is impossible for us to sacrifice our vital legal rights for the sake of neutral powers.

"We can remind critics that the United States in 1861–1865 did not relax the blockade of the South because Lancashire was starving, and we did not ask them to do it. So the British nation is not going to let go. Its very existence is at stake. It is going to insist on a real blockade of Germany and will make short work of its ministers if they do not convert their sham blockade into a real strangle hold."

Then the editorial continues:

"Nothing could be more desirable at this time than that amateurs in international law should inform themselves about blockades and their operation; should learn accurately and in detail the part this Nation has played in making the world's law on this subject. The spectacle of ignorance criticizing that intelligence has not been edifying, nor is it calculated to flatter American vanity."

It is not difficult to discern in this editorial a note of glee that American commerce is to be burdened still further that the ultimate triumph of the allies may be assured. An article in the same paper on the day following that on which the comment quoted appeared contained the following:

"The allies will be following the rules made by the United States in the Civil War and established, long after that war, by arbitral tribunals on behalf of the United States and England. * * * That Britain now intends to extend the blockade to neutral ports, precisely as the United States extended it to Nassau, in the Bahamas, and to Matamoras, in Mexico, during the Civil War, was clearly foreshadowed sometime ago in a dispatch of Sir Edward Grey:

"'If a blockade can only become effective by extending it to neutral commerce passing through neutral ports, such an extension is defensible and in accordance with principles which have met with general acceptance.'"

In the case of the Peterhoff (5 Wall., 28) the Supreme Court of the United States asserted that the mouth of the Rio Grande was not included within any proclamation of blockade; that the port of Matamoros never was blockaded; and that this Government could not, while it remained at peace with Mexico, blockade its ports or found any rights upon a claim that they or any of them were in a state of blockade.

As to Nassau, it is sufficient to say that no excuse can be offered for asserting that it was blockaded, or that the United States ever pretended that it was. Our Navy seized various ships bound for that port, carrying cargoes which were, in fact, destined for some port in the Confederate States, not because Nassau was in a state of blockade, but because the ultimate destination of the goods they carried was a blockaded port to which they were to be hurried from Nassau at the first opportunity. The doctrine of "continuous voyage" was applied, and the cargoes held subject to seizure and confiscation equally as though the ships were proceeding direct from Liverpool or London to Charleston or Savannah.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana for information as to whether it was ever the claim on the part of the British Government that there was a blockade of Nassau, or does the claim simply come from some other source than the British Government?

Mr. WALSH. I have never heard from any British source the claim that Nassau was blockaded. That idea apparently originated here.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I think he can safely say that no English law writer has ever suggested that the Government of the United States blockaded a neutral port. That suggestion has come solely from the Tory press of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. The distinction between a seizure of a ship for carrying contraband and for running a blockade is perfectly plain to any ordinary intelligence, and confusion is likely only in the minds of those who will not see. A seizure of contraband can be made because it is such only when it is going into the enemy country, either directly or indirectly. A ship is liable to capture and to confiscation with her cargo for attempting either to enter or to depart from a blockaded port, which must of necessity be an enemy port.

Applying these principles, as to which there was no room for controversy between this country and Great Britain when the present war began, if, indeed, they were not acknowledged by all maritime nations, to the problems that confront us, and it follows that the allies may seize contraband on the high seas consigned to a port of Holland, for instance, but in reality destined for Germany; and that, conceding a blockade of German ports to be maintained, they may (1) capture and confiscate any vessel attempting either to enter or depart from any such port, together with their cargoes of whatever character they may be; and (2) seize any vessel carrying goods to a neutral port and confiscate such part of her cargo as can be shown to be destined for Germany, to which it is to be carried by sea through a blockaded port; in other words, goods destined for Germany that must run the blockade in order to enter that country are subject to confiscation. But a vessel issuing from a port of Holland en route to America is not subject to molestation whatever may be the character of her cargo. England can not blockade the ports of Holland while she remains at peace with that nation as she may those of Germany, with which country she is at war. So far as any obstacle has been placed by the allies upon the passage of dyestuffs, sugar-beet seed, potash, or any goods of German origin through the ports of Holland to this country, the interference has been lawless and in contempt of the neutral nations affected—that nation from whose port the vessel detained sailed, the nation whose flag she bore, and the nation to which the goods she carried were bound.

So noncontraband goods that need pass no blockade in order to enter Germany, consigned to a neutral port from which they are to proceed overland to the enemy country, can not, except in defiance of international law, be held. If there are any articles of commerce passing in trade from this country to Germany not on the contraband lists of the allies, their detention en route is equally lawless. Multitudes of articles are found in such lists, the inclusion of which can be justified by no rule of reason. It would be a service of no mean order if some one would canvass these lists to show, as did the Senator from Georgia a few days ago in the case of cotton and foodstuffs, how plainly such lists violate in many particulars accepted canons of the laws of nations and how often they have been denounced, in principle, by the statesmen, publicists, and jurists of the nations that have issued them. For the present I content myself with directing attention to those aspects of the controversy that involve no disputed questions of fact. I shall assume that every article on the lists of contraband is legitimately and justifiably there. I shall assume that an effective blockade of the North Sea ports of Germany has been maintained and that the Order in Council of March 11 possesses all the virtue of a proclamation of blockade which it is now urged ought to be promulgated.

UNITED STATES NEVER BLOCKADED NEUTRAL PORTS.

I recur to the wholly baseless suggestion, repeated in substance in the heat of debate in this chamber only recently, that the United States is complaining of rules of naval warfare which it developed in the Civil War.

President Lincoln's proclamation of April 19, 1861, declared the intention of the Government "to set on foot a blockade of the ports," not of any neutral State, but of "the States aforesaid" which, as recited in the proclamation, were the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas. Subsequently by a proclamation dated April 27, 1861, the blockade was extended to the States of Virginia and North Carolina, which proclamation asserted that "an efficient blockade of the ports of those States will also be established."

Foreign Governments were advised "that it was intended to blockade the whole coast from the Chesapeake Bay to the Rio Grande." The question presented in the case of the Peterhoff was whether the blockade extended to the entire mouth of the Rio Grande, forbidding access to the Mexican port of Matamoros, situated on the right bank of that river opposite Brownsville, in the State of Texas. No such audacious pretension as the assertion of a right to blockade the ports of Mexico generally in order to intercept trade overland between them and the States of the Confederacy was ever made by anyone speaking for the United States. When the so-called Matamoros cases, including the one specifically referred to, came before the Supreme Court, it was claimed, among other reasons advanced in justification of the captures, that the blockade embraced not all the ports of Mexico but that of Matamoros only, because of its situation with reference to the boundary stream. The court in its opinion entered upon an inquiry, to which it was led in view of the contention to which reference has been made, of the right of a belligerent to blockade the mouth of such a stream; and, after reviewing cases on which some reliance was placed, asserted:

"It is sufficient to say that none of them support the doctrine that a belligerent can blockade the mouth of a river occupied on one bank by neutrals with complete rights of navigation."

The court took some pride, doubtless, in being able to add:

"We have no hesitation, therefore, in holding that the mouth of the Rio Grande was not included in the blockade of the ports of the rebel States and that neutral commerce with Matamoros, except in contraband, was entirely free."

No English writer on international law pretends that this Government ever sought to interdict innocent trade through Mexican or other neutral ports as a means of overcoming the Confederacy.

Hall's International Law says:

"During the Civil War the courts of the United States conceded that trade to Matamoros, on the Mexican shore of the Rio Grande, was perfectly lawful."

And Oppenheim, a modern English writer of the very highest authority, in his compendious treatise on international law, refers to the subject in the following language:

"When, in 1863, during the blockade of the coast of the Confederate States, the Federal cruiser Vanderbilt captured the vessel Peterhoff, destined for Matamoros, on the Mexican shore of the Rio Grande, the American courts released the vessel on the ground that trade with Mexico, which was neutral, could not be prohibited."

The proclamation of President Lincoln under which the blockade of the southern ports was inaugurated speaks for itself, and refutes the claim that any Mexican or other neutral ports were within its terms. If it was to any extent ambiguous as to the port of Matamoros, the Supreme Court had no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that there was no purpose on the part of the military branch of the Government to violate the established principles of international law by attempting to make it effective to restrain innocent commerce with that port. The contention made in that behalf was rejected by the court not only upon the plain language of the proclamation, but upon a consideration of the authorities, which denied to a belligerent the right to blockade the mouth of a stream which formed the common boundary between the country of its enemy and that of a neutral. The court declared laconically that "Matamoros was not and could not be blockaded."

BLOCKADE OF NEUTRAL PORTS FORBIDDEN BY LAW OF NATIONS.

The principle announced had universal acquiescence from the powers participating in the Naval Conference of 1909, and was expressed tersely in the once celebrated but now contemned London Declaration, as follows:

"ARTICLE 1. A blockade must not extend beyond the ports and coasts belonging to or occupied by the enemy."

The report of the drafting committee has the following comment on this article:

"Blockade, as an operation of war, can be directed by a belligerent only against his adversary. This very simple rule is laid down at the start, but its full scope is apparent only when it is read in connection with article 18."

The article referred to is as follows:

"The blockading forces must not bar access to neutral ports or coasts."

Concerning it the report mentioned says:

"This rule has been thought necessary the better to protect the commercial interests of neutral countries. It completes article 1, according to which a blockade must not extend beyond the ports and coasts of the enemy, which implies that, as it is an operation of war, it must not be directed against a neutral port, in spite of the importance to a belligerent of the part played by that neutral port in supplying his adversary."

These axiomatic declarations of the Conference express in slightly different language the rule on the subject as it was presented by Great Britain in her formal memorandum presented to the assembly. It will be recalled that Sir Edward Grey, in his invitation to the powers, suggested that they "interchange memoranda setting out concisely what they regard as the correct rule of international law" on the points to be considered at the conference.

The subject of "blockade" in the memorandum submitted by him on behalf of the British Government was introduced by the following proposition:

"1. A blockade is an act of war carried on by the warships of a belligerent detailed to prevent access to or departure from a defined part of the enemy's coast."

Not the coast of a neutral, but an enemy's coast.

It has been advanced in this connection that though the Supreme Court eventually held that the blockade could not be legitimately extended to include Matamoros, the decision did not come until after the war was over, and that meanwhile our naval forces seized all vessels trading to that port upon the assumption that it was in a state of blockade. In other words, it is offered that our Navy during the Civil War ruthlessly disregarded the rights of a friendly neighboring power by blockading its ports, and that we ought not now to complain because of like conduct on the part of the allies through which our trade is injuriously affected. Bad as that logic is, the assumed facts upon which it rests are wanting.

The capture of the Peterhoff was made and was justified by the court because the ship was carrying contraband as a part of her cargo destined to Texas. It was submitted to the court whether for this offense the ship, too, should not be condemned. The court held that the captors having found contraband aboard, it was their duty to bring the ship in for adjudication, and accordingly costs were awarded against her, a burden the court felt the less hesitancy about imposing in view of the fact that her captain had, in anticipation of capture, thrown overboard a package believed to contain incriminating papers. The search of the boarding officers having revealed the contraband articles, the vessel was brought before the prize court. It would have been quite unnecessary to examine into the character of her cargo if she was subject, in the opinion of the naval commander who overhauled her, or under any instructions issued to him by his Government, to seizure because her port of destination, Matamoros, was in a state of blockade. In such a case he would have taken her, whatever the nature of her cargo. I repeat, the Peterhoff was captured because she was carrying contraband, not because she was atempting to run a blockade to reach the port of Matamoros. It was the duty of counsel to place before the court every consideration of law or fact that, in his judgment, might uphold the seizure and secure the most comprehensive adjudication of condemnation. He advanced that Matamoros was a blockaded port; that was rejected. He advanced that the real destination of the ship was Brownsville—that, in fact, her cargo was to go to that port by lighters and not to Matamoros; that was rejected. He advanced that the noncontraband part of her cargo was to go overland from Matamoros to some point in Texas and therefore should be confiscated; that was rejected.

TRADE WITH ENEMY COUNTRY THROUGH NEUTRAL PORTS, EXCEPT IN CONTRABAND, NOT SUBJECT TO INTERRUPTION.

This leads to the consideration of a feature of the case of transcendant importance at the present juncture. Perhaps no incident of the war has more profoundly stirred the human heart or aroused a keener sense of man's inhumanity to man than the refusal of the allies to allow milk to be introduced into Germany through the ports of Holland for the sustenance of the babes of the countries in arms against them.

Of the legitimacy of efforts to starve the noncombatants of an enemy country in order to drive the authorities into submission or to sue for peace, it is useless to inquire. The reduction of beleagured cities by famine rather than by assault is a method of warfare that may claim the sanction of great age, at least. It is open to suspicious minds, too, to speculate upon whether it can be that the dairy industry of Germany is in such a state of paralysis that milk can not be supplied to meet the requirements of starving babies.

No matter. By what right is anyone in this country forbidden to send milk, if he chooses to do so, to Germany overland through Holland? Milk has not yet been included in any lists of contraband. It would be absurd that it should be, but not much more so than that many of the articles so classified are found in them. Rubber gloves for nurses may be excluded because the material of which they are made is classified as contraband, but milk thus far has been regarded as innocuous as an instrument or equipment of war.

In the Peterhoff case the court found it settled by an unbroken line of English authorities that noncontraband goods destined to a neutral port from which they were to be transshipped by land to the enemy country were not subject to seizure as prize, and having given its assent to the doctrine they announced, declared:

"We must say, therefore, that trade between London and Matamoros, even with intent to supply from Matamoros goods to Texas, violated no blockade, and can not be declared unlawful."

And this declaration was followed by the following announcement of the principles and the duty of the court in the premises:

"Trade with a neutral port in immediate proximity to the territory of one belligerent is certainly very inconvenient to the other. Such trade, with unrestricted inland commerce between such a port and the enemy's territory, impairs undoubtedly, and very seriously impairs, the value of a blockade of the enemy's coast. But in cases such as that now in judgment we administer the public law of nations, and are not at liberty to inquire what is for the particular advantage or disadvantage of our own or another country. We must follow the lights of reason and the lessons of the masters of international jurisprudence."

In this the court but paraphrased the language used by Sir William Scott in 1801 in the case of the Stert (4 Rob., 65), Holland being blockaded, goods were sent from Edam, near Amsterdam, by inland transportation to Emden in Hanover, a neighboring State, with which England was at peace, and were captured on the sea en route to London. He released the goods though it was advanced that if such trade were permitted it would defeat, partially at least, the object of the blockade, namely, to cripple the trade of Holland; but he observed—

"If that is the consequence, all that can be said is that it is an unavoidable consequence. It must be imputed to the nature of the thing which will not admit a remedy of this species. The court can not on that ground take upon itself to say that a legal blockade exists where no actual blockade can be applied."

Sir William Scott, afterwards Lord Stowell, before whom most of the prize cases originating during the earlier Napoleonic wars were heard, is justly esteemed at home and abroad as one of the greatest expositors of the law of prize of any age or nation.

He applied the principle to the case of goods going overland from Amsterdam to Rotterdam when, for reasons satisfactory to its Government, his country had blockaded the former port but had not proclaimed a blockade of the latter. These were cases of goods proceeding from a blockaded port to a neutral port for transshipment. He enforced the same principle in the case of goods proceeding from a neutral port to a neutral port for transport by land to the enemy country. In that case the goods were shipped from London to Emden for transshipment to Amsterdam when Holland was under blockade.

Sir Robert Phillimore, who attained a high reputation as a practitioner in prize cases in England and afterwards became a judge of the High Court of Admiralty and a member of the privy council, in his Commentaries upon International Law, expresses the rule of these cases in this brief sentence:

"Trade of a neutral to or from a blockaded country by inland navigation or transportation is lawful."

He supports this statement by reference to the Peterhoff case, "in which," he says, "the law is well summed up."

Two principles, concerning which none ventured to cavil even before this war began, may be thus stated:

First. Neutral ports can not be blockaded, from which it follows that goods issuing from them, whatever their character, not destined directly or indirectly to the enemy country can not be interfered with by a belligerent.

Second. Noncontraband goods may freely enter neutral ports though destined for the enemy country by inland transportation, notwithstanding a blockade.

PRINCIPLE OF FREE SHIPS, FREE GOODS VIOLATED BY MARCH ORDER IN COUNCIL.

On March 1, 1915, the British ambassador communicated to the Department of State the purpose of his Government and that of France to "take into port ships carrying goods of presumed enemy destination, ownership, or origin."

It was, accordingly, proposed that any goods proceeding from this country to Germany or Austria, including noncontraband goods, should be seized though routed by a port of Holland by rail to their ultimate destination, in disregard of principle 2.

It was proposed that goods of German origin reaching Amsterdam, for instance, by land transportation and on the sea en route for America for consumption there should be seized in disregard of principle 1.

It was proposed that goods owned by a German or Austrian, wherever they were found on the high seas and in neutral vessels, and wherever they were bound, should be seized. This was in flagrant violation of the principle that "free ships make free goods," to which, after a long and historic struggle, Great Britain acceded by the treaty of Paris, in 1856.

This feature was met by an immediate telegraphic protest from our Government. It would be pleasing to be able to note that in one particular Great Britain had been recalled to an observance of the rules of maritime warfare intended to limit the burdens to which infuriated belligerents might be disposed to subject neutral commerce. For a brief space it appeared that she had been.

In a note dated March 15, 1915, the British foreign office advised our ambassador that the allies "restrict their claim to the stopping of cargoes destined to or coming from the enemy's territory," which, it will be observed, was a disclaimer of a purpose to seize goods simply because they were enemy owned. But this hope was dispelled by the order itself, which bore date March 11, 1915, under which such goods were plainly subjected to the risk of seizure, as will appear from paragraphs 3 and 4 thereof, as follows:

"3. Every merchant vessel (a Dutch vessel, for instance) which sailed from her port of departure (New York, for instance) after the 1st of March, 1915, on her way to a port other than a German port (Rotterdam, for instance), carrying goods with an enemy destination, or with enemy property, may be required to discharge such goods in a British or allied port. Any goods so discharged in a British port shall be placed in the custody of the marshal of the prize court, and, unless they are contraband of war, shall, if not requisitioned for the use of His Majesty, be restored by order of the court upon such terms as the court may in the circumstances deem to be just to the person entitled thereto.

"4. Every merchant vessel (a Dutch vessel, for instance) which sailed from a port other than a German port (Rotterdam, for instance, to New York) after the 1st of March, 1915, having on board goods which are of enemy origin or are enemy property may be required to discharge such goods in a British or allied port. Goods so discharged in a British port shall be placed in the custody of the marshal of the prize court, and if not requisitioned for the use of His Majesty shall be detained or sold under the direction of the prize court. The proceeds of goods so sold shall be paid into court and dealt with in such manner as the court may in the circumstances deem to be just: Provided, That no proceeds of sale of such goods shall be paid out of court until the conclusion of peace, except on the application of the proper officer of the Crown unless it be shown that the goods had become neutral property before the issue of this order: Provided also, That nothing herein shall prevent the release of neutral property of enemy origin on the application of the proper officer of the Crown."

For convenience of reference, Mr. President, I send to the desk a copy of the order in full, and ask that it may be printed as an appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WALSH. Earl Grey, moved perhaps by the insensate demand to "put the admiralty in charge" and to "let the foreign office stick to its proper business of explaining the sailor's business to neutral States in soothing and dignified terms," in his note of July 24, 1915, explained this obvious inconsistency between the language of the order and that of his letter transmitting it by saying that enemy ownership would be regarded as evidence of enemy origin or destination, and he indicated that it was a concession that goods in neutral ships owned by enemies of Great Britain were allowed to pass when "enemy ownership would afford no evidence of such origin or destination." The implied threat of seizure of such goods when in the opinion of a zealous naval officer the conclusion of enemy origin or destination is a proper one from the fact of enemy ownership, no doubt operates effectively to keep such goods off the water, so that the principle of "free ships—free goods" has, in principle as well as for practical purposes, gone likewise into the scrap heap.

Just what is to be gained by a formal proclamation of blockade, recently threatened and to be enforced, as has been the Order in Council, against neutral ports as to all goods of "enemy origin or destination," is not clear, unless it be that the prospect of confiscation is looked to further to deter shipments of such goods. It is scarcely to be conceived that an actual blockade of neutral ports is contemplated, since such a course would be tantamount to a declaration of war against all Europe not now in arms.

Commerce has been carried on with neutral countries ever since the order of March 11 was promulgated under the restrictions which would obtain in the case of a blockade of the German ports, with the added burdens referred to, though the penalty of confiscation was not in all cases to be visited upon the offending American citizens who should, in accordance with his indisputable rights under the laws of nations, attempt to bring his goods out of Germany or send thither noncontraband articles through a neutral port. He might or might not, in the discretion of the prize court, when it should in its own good time get around to his case, award him compensation on the basis of the English market.

It needs no elucidation that ordinary trade could not be carried on under such conditions. Some individuals might care to take the chances with respect to goods of limited quantity which, for special reasons, they might desire inordinately to get through. Others who would not scruple to engage in contraband trade might be tempted to try it on no small scale, but the aggregate volume of business that would be or that has been carried on is small compared with the volume that would have been developed had a way been found to give to international law more than an academic character. Even before the promulgation of the Order in Council of March 11, when commerce with Germany in everything not contraband was theoretically free, it was found possible to paralyze it. How this was accomplished in the case of cotton, without even declaring it contraband, has been told you. Copper was not declared conditional contraband until September 21, 1914, or absolute contraband until October 29, 1914, all but three months after the war began, but no copper had meanwhile gone to Germany.

No particularization is necessary to impress upon the mind the seriousness of the denial of our right to import freely through neutral ports goods originating in Germany or Austria. The textile manufacturer has made himself heard in consequence of interferences with shipments of dyestuffs; the cotton farmer appreciates, if no one else does, what it is to be without potash fertilizer; the sugar-beet grower will scarcely be convinced of the superior excellence of Montana beet seed until time shall have demonstrated it. The seriousness of the interruptions in our export trade, for which justification is claimed under the March Order in Council, has had less consideration, very likely, because so few articles of consequence were nominally free to pass to Germany even before it was promulgated. Phosphate rock, however, is a commodity that was overlooked in the preparation of the allies' lists of contraband. It is an important commercial product of the States of Florida, Tennessee, and South Carolina. Deposits of very great extent and value are known to exist in several of the Rocky Mountain States, but only a relatively small quantity from those fields has yet gone into the channels of commerce. We exported this product to the value of $9,996,558 in 1913. Seventy-eight per cent of the total production comes from the State of Florida and a little more than the yield of that State normally goes abroad, Germany being our best customer. At least one-half of all we have been accustomed to ship across the sea was absorbed by that country, finding its way either through its ports or those of adjacent countries.

During the first 10 months of 1915 we contrived to get $7,450 worth into Germany, or rather so much left our ports for Germany, as against $2,701,105 worth for a like period during 1913, while the shipments to the Netherlands fell more than 50 per cent and Belgium took nothing, though her normal importation annually amounts to nearly a million dollars.

On June 8, 1915, the American steamship F. J. Lisman, New York to Rotterdam, was brought into the port of London and 1,000 barrels of phosphate removed from her for disposition by the prize court. It will be borne in mind that phosphate is not contraband, either absolute or conditional. The seizure must find whatever justification it can have in the Order of March 11, it being claimed, doubtless, that the ultimate destination of this portion of the cargo was Germany, to which it was to go by inland transportation from Rotterdam. There is here no disputed question of fact unless it be asserted by the shippers that this particular consignment was for consumption in the Netherlands. If so, inquiry into that phase may be waived and it may be assumed that it was in fact going to Germany.

There is no question, either nebulous or substantial, as to whether phosphate rock is justifiably classed as contraband. It has, as stated, no place in the contraband lists. The case presents squarely the rule of law for which the great name of Lord Stowell stands in England and Chief Justice Chase in this country, from which there has hitherto been "no variableness, neither shadow of turning."

Why can it not be made serviceable to determine whether principles so sanctioned are any longer to exercise any restraining influence upon those nations that appeal to arms? Is it to be believed that no voice will be raised in England for the preservation of the proudest monuments that nation has builded? And which can surpass in symmetry or grandeur those reared by her great judges, the rules by which even the King and the Council were required to render justice to friendly nations and their people? Let us force, if we can, an expression on a concrete case. Our progress will be imperceptible while we debate en masse a multitude of principles, many of which permit of prolonged discussion or an aggregation of cases over the facts of many of which there is opportunity for parleying.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. WALSH. With pleasure.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know whether the Senator stated the registry of the vessel carrying the cargo of phosphate. Was it a British vessel?

Mr. WALSH. It was the F. J. Lisman. She is a Danish vessel, I think.

Mr. FLETCHER. A Danish vessel? So long as she was of a neutral registry, there could not be any change in the principle announced?

Mr. WALSH. Not at all.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was not certain but that it was a vessel of British registry.

Mr. WALSH. It is a straight question as to whether that principle of international law is gone.

UNLAWFUL SEIZURE OF MAILS.

No difficulty will be encountered in selecting a characteristic case to test the right of the allies to arrest merchandise coming from Germany to this country through a neutral port to which it was carried overland or, for the matter of that, by sea, but not through a blockaded port. It is understood that there is no pretense that the German ports on the Baltic are in a state of blockade. The recent seizure of the mails from Denmark to the United States will very well serve the purpose.

At the outset Great Britain assumed the right to open and censor the mails landed at any of her ports, but with a continental destination. This caused the Post Office Department to route such mails, whenever possible, by ships not required to touch at British ports. Recently neutral vessels, carrying the mails both ways, respectively have been haled into some English harbor, the sacks rifled, letters opened and censored, and parcels containing goods of "enemy origin or destination" confiscated. Among the treaties which were the product of the second Hague convention, held in 1907, was one dealing with postal correspondence. It was ratified by the Senate March 12, 1908, and proclaimed February 28, 1910. Great Britain, France, Russia, Italy were all signatories. It is introduced by the two following articles:

ARTICLE I.

"The postal correspondence of neutrals or belligerents, whatever its official or private character may be, found on the high seas on board a neutral or enemy ship is inviolable. If the ship is detained, the correspondence is forwarded by the captor with the least possible delay.

"The provisions of the preceding paragraph do not apply, in case of violation of blockade, to correspondence destined for or proceeding from a blockaded port.

ARTICLE II.

"The inviolability of postal correspondence does not exempt a neutral mail ship from the laws and customs of maritime war as to neutral merchant ships in general. The ship, however, may not be searched, except when absolutely necessary, and then only with as much consideration and expedition as possible."

As indicative of the delicate nature of the task which Earl Grey is heroically endeavoring to discharge of "explaining the sailor's business to neutral States in soothing and dignified terms," it is offered in justification of these particular acts of violence that the second paragraph of article 1, recited, permits the interception of mail from a blockaded port. Munich is not a blockaded port, nor is it a port at all. It is offered, too, that the parcel post does not fall within the protection of the treaties, but is to be regarded so far as treaty rights are concerned, as ordinary freight. There seems to be much reason in this contention, and few could find fault with the seizure of rubber or other contraband going to Sweden by mail. Shipment of such a commodity by mail would carry a presumption that it was intended for transshipment to and consumption in enemy territory.
